Coming into Force

8 These Regulations come into force on the day on which they are made.

REGULATORY IMPACT ANALYSIS STATEMENT

(This statement is not part of the Regulations or the Order.)

Issues

Canada has experienced mass shootings in rural and urban areas such as in Nova Scotia, city of Québec, Montréal, and Toronto. Whether at home or abroad, the deadliest mass shootings are commonly perpetrated with assault-style firearms. These events, and concerns about the inherent deadliness of assault-style firearms used in them, have led to increasing public demand for measures to address gun violence and mass shootings in Canada.

The Regulations Amending the Regulations Prescribing Certain Firearms and Other Weapons, Components and Parts of Weapons, Accessories, Cartridge Magazines, Ammunition and Projectiles as Prohibited, Restricted or Non-Restricted (Regulations) amend the Regulations that classify firearms (Classification Regulations) to prescribe certain firearms as prohibited firearms. The Regulations prohibit approximately 1 500 models of assault-style firearms, including current and future variants. The Regulations also prescribe the upper receivers of M16, AR-10, AR-15 and M4 pattern firearms to be prohibited devices.

The Regulations address gun violence and the threat to public safety by assault-style firearms. The Government of Canada recognizes that their inherent deadliness makes them unsuitable for civilian use and a serious threat to public safety given the degree to which they can increase the severity of mass shootings.

The Order Declaring an Amnesty Period (2020) (the Amnesty Order) accompanies the Regulations to protect individuals, who were in lawful possession of one or more of the newly prohibited firearms or prohibited devices on the day the Regulations came into force, from criminal liability for unlawful possession for the purpose of allowing individuals to come into compliance with the law.

Entrée en vigueur

8 Le présent règlement entre en vigueur à la date de sa prise.

RÉSUMÉ DE L'ÉTUDE D'IMPACT DE LA RÉGLEMENTATION

Enjeux

Le Canada a connu des fusillades de masse dans les régions rurales et urbaines comme la Nouvelle-Écosse, la ville de Québec, Montréal et Toronto. Que ce soit au Canada ou à l'étranger, les fusillades de masse les plus meurtrières sont souvent perpétrées au moyen d'armes à feu de style arme d'assaut. Ces événements, et les préoccupations au sujet du caractère mortel inhérent des armes à feu de style arme d'assaut alors utilisées, ont amené le public à réclamer de plus en plus de mesures pour lutter contre la violence commise avec des armes à feu et les fusillades de masse au Canada.

Le Règlement modifiant le Règlement désignant des armes à feu, armes, éléments ou pièces d'armes, accessoires, chargeurs, munitions et projectiles comme étant prohibés ou à autorisation restreinte (le Règlement) modifie le Règlement sur la classification des armes à feu (Règlement sur la classification) afin de prévoir que certaines armes à feu sont des armes à feu prohibées. Le Règlement interdit approximativement 1 500 modèles d'armes à feu de style d'assaut, y compris des variantes actuelles et futures. Le Règlement prescrit également que les carcasses supérieures des armes à feu de type M16, AR-10, AR-15 et M4 sont des dispositifs prohibés.

Le Règlement vise à lutter contre la violence commise avec des armes à feu et la menace à la sécurité publique que représentent les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut. Le gouvernement du Canada reconnaît que leur caractère mortel inhérent fait que de telles armes ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile et présentent une grave menace pour la sécurité publique compte tenu du degré auquel de telles armes peuvent accroître la gravité des fusillades de masse.

Le Décret fixant une période d'amnistie (2020) (le Décret d'amnistie) accompagne le Règlement et confère aux personnes qui étaient en possession légale d'une ou de plusieurs armes à feu nouvellement prohibées ou dispositifs prohibés au moment de l'entrée en vigueur du Règlement une immunité en matière de droit pénal pour la possession illégale de telles armes en vue de permettre aux particuliers de se conformer avec la loi.

During the amnesty period, the Government intends to implement a buy-back program to compensate affected owners for the value of their firearms after they are delivered to a police officer; however, until a buy-back program is offered, affected owners will not be eligible for compensation. An option to participate in a grandfathering regime would also be made available for affected owners. Further public communications on the buy-back program and the grandfathering regime will follow later.

Pendant la période d'amnistie, le gouvernement a l'intention de mettre en œuvre un programme de rachat pour indemniser les propriétaires touchés pour la valeur de leurs armes à feu qu'ils auront remises à un agent de police; cependant, jusqu'à l'établissement d'un programme de rachat, les propriétaires touchés ne seront pas admissibles à une indemnisation. Une option permettant de participer à un régime de maintien des droits acquis serait aussi offerte aux propriétaires touchés. D'autres communications publiques sur le programme de rachat et le régime de maintien des droits acquis suivront.

The Regulations and the Amnesty Order come into force on the day they are made. The Amnesty Order expires on April 30, 2022.

Le Règlement et le Décret d'amnistie entrent en vigueur le jour où ils seront pris. Le Décret d'amnistie prend fin le 30 avril 2022.

Background

Canada has experienced mass shootings in rural and urban areas such as in Nova Scotia, city of Québec, Montréal and Toronto. Whether at home or abroad, the deadliest mass shootings are commonly perpetrated with assault-style firearms. Given these events, the growing concern for public safety, the increasing public demand for measures to address gun violence and mass shootings and, in particular, the concern resulting from the inherent deadliness of assault-style firearms that are not suitable for civilian use, these firearms must be prohibited in Canada.

Assault-style firearms are not suitable for hunting or sport shooting purposes given the inherent danger that they pose to public safety. The newly prescribed firearms are primarily designed for military or paramilitary purposes with the capability of injuring, immobilizing or killing humans in large numbers within a short period of time given the basic characteristics they possess, such as a tactical or military design and capability of holding a quickly reloadable large-capacity magazine. While some of these newly prohibited firearms were previously used by individuals for hunting or sporting purposes, it is the view of the Government that those firearms are unreasonable and disproportionate for such purposes. The significant risk that these firearms pose to the public's safety outweighs any justification for their continued use and availability within Canada given that numerous types of firearms remain available for lawful ownership for hunting or sport shooting purposes.

Contexte

Les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut ne conviennent pas pour la chasse ou le tir sportif compte tenu du danger inhérent qu'elles présentent pour la sécurité du public. Les armes à feu nouvellement prohibées sont principalement conçues à des fins militaires ou paramilitaires et ont la capacité de causer des blessures, d'immobiliser ou de tuer des humains en grand nombre dans un court laps de temps compte tenu des caractéristiques de base qu'elles possèdent, comme une conception tactique ou militaire et la capacité de contenir un chargeur grande capacité rapidement rechargeable. Bien que certaines de ces armes à feu nouvellement prohibées aient déjà été utilisées par des particuliers pour la chasse ou le sport, le gouvernement est d'avis que l'utilisation de ces armes à feu est déraisonnable et disproportionnée à de telles fins. Le risque important que ces armes à feu posent pour la sécurité du public l'emporte sur toute justification relative à leur utilisation et à leur disponibilité continue au Canada étant donné qu'il continue d'être possible d'avoir la possession légale de nombreux types d'armes à feu à des fins de chasse ou de tir sportif.

The Classification Regulations prescribe firearms as prohibited, restricted or nonrestricted, and also include variants and certain modified versions of the listed firearms.

Pursuant to subsections 84(1) and 117.15(1) of the Criminal Code, the Governor in Council (GIC) has the authority to prescribe a firearm or a device to be prohibited in accordance with the definitions of "prohibited firearm" and "prohibited device."

Pursuant to section 117.14 of the Criminal Code, the GIC is also authorized to declare an amnesty period when a firearm or device is prohibited for the purpose of permitting affected owners to come into compliance with the law.

Objective

The prescribing of firearms as prohibited is intended to limit the access to firearms that are characterized by their design and their capability of inflicting significant harm to Canadians. The Regulations address a growing public concern regarding the safety risk posed by assault-style firearms and their suitability for civilian use. The amendments to the Classification Regulations are intended to reduce the number and availability of assault-style firearms and other firearms that exceed safe civilian use in Canada, and to reduce the possibility of these firearms being diverted to the illegal market. Many of the known variants or modified versions of the approximately 1 500 firearms are also specifically prescribed to be prohibited firearms. The Regulations apply to all variants of the principal model, current or future, whether they are expressly listed or not.

Description

The Regulations have been amended to prescribe as prohibited approximately 1 500 models of firearms. Of those, nine principal models of assault-style firearms are prohibited as they (1) have semi-automatic action with sustained rapid-fire capability (tactical/military design with large magazine capacity), (2) are of modern design, and (3) are present in large volumes in the Canadian market.

The Regulations prescribe the firearms set out below as "prohibited firearms" and also specifically prescribe the known variants of the principal models:

- M16, AR-10, and AR-15 rifles and M4 carbine;
- Ruger Mini-14 rifle;
- US Rifle M14;
- Vz58 rifle;

Le Règlement sur la classification prévoit que les armes à feu sont prohibées, à autorisation restreinte ou sans restriction, et comprend également des variantes et certaines versions modifiées des armes à feu énumérées.

En vertu des paragraphes 84(1) et 117.15(1) du Code criminel, le gouverneur en conseil (GC) a le pouvoir de prescrire qu'une arme à feu ou un dispositif est prohibé conformément aux définitions d'« arme à feu prohibée » ou de « dispositif prohibé ».

En vertu de l'article 117.14 du Code criminel, le GC est autorisé à fixer une période d'amnistie à l'égard d'une arme à feu ou d'un dispositif prohibés afin de permettre aux propriétaires touchés de se conformer à la loi.

Objectif

La prohibition d'armes à feu vise à limiter l'accès à des armes à feu qui se caractérisent par leur conception et leur capacité à causer d'importants dommages aux Canadiens. Le Règlement répond à une préoccupation croissante du public relativement au risque pour la sécurité que posent les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et à leur utilisation à des fins civiles. Les modifications du Règlement sur la classification visent à réduire le nombre et la disponibilité des armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et d'autres armes à feu qui ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile au Canada et à réduire la possibilité de détournement de ces armes à feu vers le marché illicite. Il est aussi expressément prévu que constituent des armes à feu prohibées un grand nombre des variantes connues ou des versions modifiées d'approximativement 1 500 armes à feu. Le Règlement s'applique à toutes les variantes du modèle principal, actuelles ou futures, qu'elles soient expressément énumérées ou non.

Description

Le Règlement a été modifié pour prévoir que sont prohibés approximativement 1 500 modèles d'armes à feu. De ce nombre, neuf modèles principaux d'armes à feu de style arme d'assaut sont prohibés puisqu'ils (1) ont une action semi-automatique avec une capacité de tir rapide soutenu (conception tactique/militaire avec un chargeur grande capacité), (2) sont de conception moderne, et (3) se retrouvent en grand nombre sur le marché canadien.

Le Règlement prévoit que les armes à feu décrites ci-après sont des « armes à feu prohibées », ainsi que les variantes connues des principaux modèles:

- fusils M16, AR-10, AR-15 et carabine M4;
- fusil Ruger Mini-14;
- fusil américain M14;
- fusil Vz58;

- Robinson Armament XCR rifle;
- CZ Scorpion EVO 3 carbines and pistols;
- Beretta Cx4 Storm carbine;
- SIG Sauer SIG MCX and SIG Sauer SIG MPX carbine and pistol; and
- Swiss Arms Classic Green and Four Seasons series (as specified in former Bill C-71: An Act to amend certain Acts and Regulations in relation to firearms).

Also included are two new categories of firearms that exceed safe civilian use. These are characterized by the following physical attributes: a 20 mm bore or greater (e.g. grenade launcher) and the capacity to discharge a projectile with a muzzle energy greater than 10 000 joules (e.g. a .50 calibre BMG). These weapons are primarily designed to produce mass human casualties or cause significant property damage at long ranges, and the potential power of these weapons exceeds safe or legitimate civilian use.

Previous classification of the newly prohibited firearm models

	Principal model	Previous classification
1	M16, AR-10, and AR-15 rifles and M4 carbine (which represent one family of firearms commonly known as the AR Platform)	Mostly restricted, some non-restricted
2	Ruger Mini-14 rifle	Mostly non-restricted, some restricted
3	Vz58 rifle	Mostly non-restricted, some restricted
4	US Rifle M14	Non-restricted
5	Beretta Cx4 Storm carbine	Restricted and non-restricted
6	Robinson Armament XCR rifle	Mostly non-restricted, some restricted
7	CZ Scorpion EVO 3 carbine and pistol	Restricted and non-restricted
8	SIG Sauer SIG MCX and SIG Sauer SIG MPX carbines and pistols	Restricted and non-restricted
9	Swiss Arms Classic Green and Four Seasons series rifles	Non-restricted and restricted

- fusil Robinson Armament XCR;
- carabines et pistolets CZ Scorpion EVO 3;
- carabine Beretta Cx4 Storm;
- carabine et pistolet SIG Sauer SIG MCX et SIG Sauer SIG MPX;
- séries Swiss Arms Classic Green et Four Seasons (tel qu'il est précisé dans l'ancien projet de loi C-71, Loi modifiant certaines lois et un règlement relatifs aux armes à feu).

Sont également incluses deux nouvelles catégories d'armes à feu qui ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile. Elles ont les caractéristiques suivantes: une âme de 20 mm ou plus (par ex. un lance-grenades) et ayant la capacité de décharger un projectile avec une énergie initiale de plus de 10 000 joules (par ex. un BMG de calibre 0,50). Ces armes à feu sont principalement conçues pour causer des pertes humaines massives ou des dommages matériels importants à grande distance, et la puissance potentielle de ces armes excède celle d'une utilisation civile sécuritaire ou légitime.

Classification antérieure des armes à feu nouvellement prohibées

	Modèle principal	Classement précédent
1	M16, AR-10, et AR-15 fusils et carabine M4 (qui représentent une famille d'armes à feu communément appelée plate-forme AR)	Principalement à autorisation restreinte, certains sans restriction
2	Fusil Mini-14	Principalement sans restriction, certains à autorisation restreinte
3	Fusil Vz58	Principalement sans restriction, certains à autorisation restreinte
4	Fusil américain M14	Sans restriction
5	Carabine Beretta Cx4 Storm	À autorisation restreinte et sans restriction
6	Fusil Robinson Armament XCR	Principalement sans restriction, certains à autorisation restreinte
7	Carabine et pistolet CZ Scorpion EVO 3	À autorisation restreinte et sans restriction
8	Carabines et pistolets SIG Sauer SIG MCX et SIG Sauer SIG MPX	À autorisation restreinte et sans restriction
9	Carabines séries Swiss Arms Classic Green et Four Seasons	À autorisation restreinte et à autorisation restreinte

Previous classification of the newly prohibited firearm categories

	Category	Previous
1	Firearms with 20 mm bore or greater	Non-restricted, a few restricted
2	Firearms capable of discharging a projectile with a muzzle energy greater than 10 000 joules	Non-restricted

Classification précédente des catégories d'armes à feu nouvellement interdites

	Catégorie	Précédent
1	Armes à feu ayant une âme de 20 mm ou plus	À autorisation restreinte et sans restriction, certaines à autorisation restreinte
2	Armes à feu pouvant tirer un projectile avec une énergie initiale de plus de 10 000 joules	Sans restriction

While devices exclusively designed for disrupting explosives (also known as "bomb disruptors") would technically have the attributes of the newly prohibited categories, they have an important function in defusing hazardous explosive devices. Recognizing Canada's international commitment to global peace and security, these devices are excluded from the prescribed list to permit their export under the Export and Import Permits Act.

Bien que les dispositifs exclusivement conçus pour désamorcer les explosifs (aussi connus sous le nom de « désamorceurs de bombes ») aient techniquement les caractéristiques des catégories nouvellement interdites, ils ont une fonction importante dans le désamorçage des dispositifs explosifs dangereux. Compte tenu de l'engagement international du Canada envers la paix et la sécurité mondiales, ces dispositifs sont exclus de la liste réglementaire pour en permettre l'exportation en vertu de la Loi sur les licences d'exportation et d'importation.

The Regulations also prescribe the upper receivers of M16, AR-10, AR-15 and M4 pattern firearms to be prohibited devices in order to ensure that these firearms cannot easily be used with illicitly manufactured or acquired lower receivers. The M16, AR-10, AR-15 and M4 firearms are modular firearms consisting of the lower receiver assembly, which is the component bearing the serial number and subject to registration that is now prohibited; and the upper receiver assembly, which is the pressure bearing component and has not previously been regulated. An owner could possess two or more upper receiver assemblies which can be mounted and dismounted on a lower receiver assembly according to the needs of the occasion. If upper receivers are not also prohibited, there is a significant public safety risk that the upper receiver assemblies would be mated with an illegal lower receiver (i.e. smuggled, made from a receiver blank, or manufactured by 3D printing to supply the illegal market) thus creating unmarked, untraceable M16, AR-10, AR-15 or M4 firearms, commonly known as "ghost guns." Prohibiting the upper receiver of these rifles will reduce the quantities in circulation and render it much more difficult to illicitly fabricate working firearms.

Le Règlement prévoit aussi que les carcasses supérieures des armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 et M4 sont des dispositifs prohibés afin de veiller à ce que ces armes à feu ne puissent être facilement utilisées avec des carcasses inférieures fabriquées ou acquises illicitement. Les armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 et M4 sont des armes à feu modulaires composées de l'assemblage de la carcasse inférieure, qui est la composante portant le numéro de série et faisant l'objet de l'enregistrement, qui sont maintenant prohibées; l'assemblage de la carcasse supérieure, lequel est le composant sous pression, n'avait pas été réglementé auparavant. Un propriétaire peut posséder deux ou plusieurs assemblages de carcasse supérieure qui peuvent être montés et démontés sur un assemblage de carcasse inférieure selon les besoins. Si les carcasses supérieures ne sont pas aussi des dispositifs prohibés, sur le plan de la sécurité publique, il est fort risqué que des assemblages de carcasse supérieure soient couplés à une carcasse inférieure illégale (c.-à-d. passées en contrebande, fabriquées à partir d'une carcasse inachevée, ou fabriquées par impression 3d pour approvisionner le marché illicite), créant ainsi des armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 ou M4, non marquées et intraçables, communément appelées « armes à feu fantômes ». Le fait de prohiber la carcasse supérieure de ces fusils réduira les quantités en circulation et rendra beaucoup plus difficile la fabrication illicite d'armes à feu qui fonctionnent.

The Amnesty Order has been made to protect affected individuals who (1) were in legal possession of a newly prohibited firearm or prohibited device at the time the Regulations came into force, and, (2) continue to hold a valid licence during the amnesty period, from criminal liability for unlawful possession of a prohibited firearm in order to afford the individuals with time to dispose of the

Le Décret d'amnistie a été pris afin de conférer aux personnes qui (1) étaient en possession légale d'une arme à feu nouvellement prohibée ou d'un dispositif prohibé au moment de l'entrée en vigueur du Règlement, et (2) continuent d'être titulaires d'un permis valide pendant la période d'amnistie, une immunité en matière pénale pour la possession illégale d'armes à feu prohibées afin de firearms. Disposal can include: having the firearm deactivated by an approved business; delivering the firearm or device to a police officer; legally exporting the firearm; and, if a business, returning the firearm or device to the manufacturer. Other permitted activities during the amnesty period are to transport the firearm for any of the above purposes and to use the newly prohibited firearm, if previously non-restricted, to hunt for the purposes of sustenance or to exercise a right recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (the Constitution). Individuals are no longer allowed to import the firearms listed in the Regulations. Affected owners will no longer be permitted to sell to individuals within Canada or use the prohibited firearms, and no transportation will be permitted except for the purposes described above. The firearms will have to be kept securely stored in accordance with the legal storage requirements for the classification of the specified firearms prior to their prohibition.

permettre aux particuliers d'en disposer. La disposition peut comprendre la neutralisation de l'arme à feu par une entreprise autorisée, la remise de l'arme à feu ou du dispositif à un agent de police, l'exportation légale de l'arme à feu; et, dans le cas d'une entreprise, le fait de retourner le dispositif ou l'arme à feu au fabricant. Les autres activités autorisées pendant la période d'amnistie sont le transport de l'arme à feu à l'une des fins susmentionnées et l'utilisation de l'arme à feu nouvellement prohibée, s'il s'agissait auparavant d'une arme à feu à autorisation non restreinte, pour chasser à des fins de subsistance ou pour exercer un droit reconnu et confirmé par l'article 35 de la Loi constitutionnelle canadienne de 1982 (la Constitution). Les particuliers ne sont plus autorisés à importer les armes à feu énumérées dans le Règlement. Les propriétaires touchés ne seront pas autorisés à vendre ces armes à feu à des particuliers au Canada ou à utiliser les armes à feu prohibées, et aucun transport n'en sera permis, sauf aux fins décrites ci-dessus. Les armes à feu devront être entreposées de façon sécuritaire en conformité avec les exigences légales d'entreposage selon la classification des armes à feu en question avant que celles-ci ne deviennent des armes à feu prohibées.

Individuals may transport the firearms one time to return home with the firearm if it was not at the owner's residence at the time the prohibition came into force, or, if not the owner and in possession of the firearm on the day the prohibition came into force, return the firearm to its owner.

Les particuliers peuvent transporter les armes à feu une fois pour rentrer chez eux avec l'arme à feu si celle-ci ne se trouvait pas à la résidence du propriétaire le jour où l'arme à feu est devenue prohibée, ou, lorsque ce n'est pas le propriétaire qui a la possession de l'arme à feu le jour où l'arme à feu devient prohibée, pour la retourner à son propriétaire.

The amnesty period begins on the date of coming into force of the Amnesty Order and expires on April 30, 2022. Upon the expiration of the Amnesty Order, individuals who are in possession of a prohibited firearm or prohibited device could be prosecuted for unlawful possession.

La période d'amnistie commence à la date d'entrée en vigueur du Décret d'amnistie et prend fin le 30 avril 2022. À l'expiration de ce décret, les particuliers qui sont en possession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'un dispositif prohibé pourraient faire l'objet d'une poursuite pour possession illégale.

The Government intends to implement a buy-back program, which would allow affected owners to declare their intent to deliver their firearms to a police officer. The buy-back would compensate affected owners for the value of their firearms after they are delivered to a police officer. An option to participate in a grandfathering regime would also be made available for affected owners.

Le gouvernement a l'intention de mettre en œuvre un programme de rachat qui permettrait aux propriétaires touchés de déclarer leur intention de remettre leur arme à feu à un agent de police. Ce programme permettrait d'indemniser les propriétaires touchés pour la valeur de leurs armes à feu une fois que celles-ci auront été remises à un agent de police. Une option de participation à un régime de maintien des droits acquis serait également offerte aux propriétaires touchés.

While an individual may dispose of a firearm by deactivating it, legally exporting it or delivering it to a police officer prior to the implementation of the buy-back program, compensation will not be available until the buy-back program is in effect. An individual should not deliver a firearm to a police station without first making arrangements with a police officer for a safe and scheduled delivery or pick up.

Un particulier peut disposer d'une arme à feu en procédant à une neutralisation de l'arme à feu, en l'exportant légalement, ou en en faisant la remise à un agent de police avant la mise en œuvre du programme de rachat; toutefois, aucune indemnisation ne sera versée jusqu'à la prise d'effet du programme d'achat. Un particulier ne devrait pas remettre une arme à feu à un poste de police sans prendre tout d'abord des dispositions avec un agent de la police pour que la livraison ou la collecte se fasse de façon sécuritaire et au moment convenu.

Regulatory development

Consultation

Extensive public engagement on the issue of banning handguns and assault-style firearms, led by the then Minister of Border Security and Organized Crime Reduction, took place between October 2018 and February 2019 with the provinces and territories, municipalities, Indigenous groups, law enforcement, community organizations, and industry. The intent of this engagement was to hear from a wide range of stakeholders, which included those both in support of and in opposition to limiting access to firearms. The engagement process included a series of eight in-person roundtables, an online questionnaire, a written submission process, and bilateral meetings with a range of stakeholders. The roundtables were held in four cities across the country (Vancouver, Montréal, Toronto, and Moncton), and 77 stakeholders participated in these sessions. In addition, 134 917 online questionnaires were received, as well as 36 written submissions, and 92 stakeholders were consulted in the bilateral meetings.

Many participants expressed their views that a ban on assault-style firearms was needed in order to protect public safety. As a result of the clear need for immediate action to implement the ban on the prescribed prohibited firearms, and to avoid a potential run on the market, no additional consultations with the public, the provinces and territories, or Indigenous groups were contemplated prior to the effective date of the amendment to the Classification Regulations.

Given the possibility of criminal liability associated with possessing a prohibited firearm, the Government has moved to implement the Amnesty Order expeditiously and, as a result, no consultations have been undertaken relative to this Order.

Modern treaty obligations and Indigenous engagement and consultation

The Amnesty Order permits the use of any of the newly prohibited firearms, if previously non-restricted, to hunt for the purposes of sustenance or to exercise a right recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution. From fall 2018 to spring 2019, the Government held extensive engagement with Indigenous groups, provinces and territories, municipalities, law enforcement agencies, academics, victim groups and other key stakeholders on limiting access to assault-style firearms and handguns. Recognizing that some Indigenous and sustenance hunters could be using previously non-restricted firearms for their hunting and may be unable to replace these firearms immediately,

Élaboration de la réglementation

Consultation

Entre octobre 2018 et février 2019, le ministre de la Sécurité frontalière et de la Réduction du crime organisé de l'époque a mené une vaste consultation publique sur la question de la prohibition des armes de poing et des armes à feu de style arme d'assaut auprès des provinces et territoires, des municipalités, des groupes autochtones, des forces de l'ordre, des organismes communautaires et de l'industrie. Ce processus de consultation visait à connaître les points de vue d'un vaste éventail d'intervenants, autant de ceux qui appuyaient la restriction de l'accès aux armes à feu que de ceux qui s'y opposaient. Dans le cadre de ce processus, il y a eu une série de huit tables rondes en personne, un questionnaire en ligne, présentation de mémoires et tenue de réunions bilatérales avec un éventail d'intervenants. Les tables rondes ont été tenues dans quatre villes à travers le Canada (Vancouver, Montréal, Toronto et Moncton), et 77 intervenants ont participé à ces séances. De plus, 134 917 questionnaires en ligne et 36 mémoires ont été reçus; 92 intervenants ont été consultés dans le cadre de réunions bilatérales.

De nombreux participants étaient d'avis qu'il était nécessaire de prohiber les fusils d'assaut pour protéger la sécurité publique. Compte tenu de la nécessité évidente de prendre des mesures immédiates pour mettre en œuvre la prohibition des armes à feu visées, et pour éviter une possible ruée sur ce marché, aucune autre consultation du public, des provinces, des territoires ou des groupes autochtones n'a été envisagée avant la date d'entrée en vigueur de la modification au Règlement sur la classification.

Compte tenu de la possibilité qu'il y ait une responsabilité associée à la possession d'une arme à feu prohibée, le gouvernement a pris des mesures pour mettre en œuvre rapidement le Décret d'amnistie et il n'y a donc pas eu de consultations au sujet de ce décret et de ce fait, aucune consultation n'a été faite au sujet de ce décret.

Obligations relatives aux traités modernes et consultation et mobilisation des Autochtones

Le Décret d'amnistie permet l'utilisation de toute arme à feu nouvellement prohibée, qui était auparavant une arme à feu sans restriction, pour chasser à des fins de subsistance ou pour exercer un droit reconnu et confirmé par l'article 35 de la Constitution. De l'automne 2018 au printemps 2019, le gouvernement a tenu de vastes consultations auprès de groupes autochtones, des provinces et des territoires, des municipalités, d'organismes chargés de l'application de la loi, de théoriciens, de groupes d'aide aux victimes et d'autres intervenants clés relativement à la question de la restriction de l'accès aux armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et aux armes de poing. Cependant, the Amnesty Order includes provisions for the limited use of these firearms for such purposes. Following the publication of the Regulations, the Government will continue to engage with Indigenous groups to assess whether the prohibition of these firearms has a continued impact on the right to hunt affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution.

afin d'atténuer le risque que certains chasseurs autochtones et chasseurs de subsistance puissent utiliser pour la chasse exclusivement une arme à feu nouvellement prohibée, mais auparavant une arme à feu sans restriction, et au regard du fait qu'il n'y a pas eu d'avis préalable relatif à la prohibition établie, ces chasseurs pourraient ne pas être en mesure de remplacer immédiatement les armes nouvellement prohibées; le Décret d'amnistie prévoit donc l'utilisation limitée de ces armes à feu à ces fins. Après la publication du Règlement, le gouvernement continuera de consulter les groupes autochtones en vue d'évaluer si la prohibition relative à ces armes à feu a une incidence continue sur les droits de chasse, tel qu'il est garanti par l'article 35 de la Constitution.

Given that the Regulations specifically prescribe firearms as prohibited, restricted and non-restricted in Canada, amendments to the Regulations are required to change the current listing of any firearms. The identified firearms will be legally reclassified as prohibited to reduce the number and availability of assault-style firearms and firearms that exceed safe civilian use in Canadian markets and to reduce the possibility of these firearms being diverted to illegal markets. No non-regulatory options were considered.

Choix de l'instrument

Puisque le Règlement prévoit spécifiquement qu'il y a au Canada des armes à feu prohibées, des armes à autorisation restreinte et des armes à feu sans restriction, il faut modifier le règlement pour changer la liste actuelle des armes à feu. Les armes à feu visées seront légalement reclassifiées en tant qu'armes prohibées afin de réduire le nombre et la disponibilité d'armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et des armes à feu qui ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile sur les marchés canadiens, et de diminuer la possibilité que ces armes à feu soient détournées vers des marchés illicites. Aucune option de nature non réglementaire n'a été examinée.

Regulatory analysis

Analyse de la réglementation

Benefits and costs

The costs associated with implementing a buy-back program and grandfathering regime have not yet been finalized. Figures reflect estimates of the portion of projected costs associated with compensation of owners, and are determined by estimates of the number of firearms implicated. Further, given the uncertain number of impacted non-restricted firearms and the program complexity, there may be additional costs.

There are 2.2 million individual firearms licence holders in Canada. It is unknown how many exactly will be affected by the prohibition; however, there are approximately 90 000 restricted firearms that would be affected; and an unknown number of non-restricted firearms (due to the fact that non-restricted firearms do not need to be registered in accordance with the Firearms Act). The implicated firearms represent some of the most prevalent firearms within the Canadian market that are of modern design, have semi-automatic action with sustained rapid-fire capability and which are able to receive a quickly reloadable, large capacity magazine. The majority of affected owners of the currently restricted firearms reside in Alberta, British Columbia or Ontario. The regional

Les coûts associés à la mise en œuvre d'un programme de rachat et à un régime de maintien des droits acquis n'ont pas encore été finalisés. Les chiffres reflètent les estimations de la portion des coûts projetés associés à l'indemnisation des propriétaires et sont déterminés par des estimations du nombre d'armes à feu en cause. Par ailleurs, compte tenu du nombre incertain d'armes à feu sans restriction touchées et de la complexité du programme, il pourrait y avoir des dépassements de coûts.

Il y a 2,2 millions de titulaires de permis d'armes à feu au Canada. On ne sait pas exactement combien de ceux-ci seront touchés par la prohibition; cependant, il y a approximativement entre 90 000 armes à feu à autorisation restreinte qui seraient visées, de même qu'un nombre inconnu d'armes à feu sans restriction qui le seraient également (puisque les armes à feu sans restriction n'ont pas besoin d'être enregistrées en vertu de la Loi sur les armes à feu). Les armes à feu visées représentent la majorité des armes à feu sur le marché canadien qui sont de conception moderne, ont une action semi-automatique avec une capacité de tir rapide soutenu et une capacité de contenir un chargeur grande capacité rapidement rechargeable. La majorité des propriétaires d'armes à feu à autorisation breakdown for affected owners of the currently non-restricted firearms is unknown because these firearms are not registered.

A Conference Board of Canada report on The Economic Footprint of Angling, Hunting, Trapping and Sport Shooting in Canada published in September 2019, found that an estimated 1.4 million Canadians participate in legal sport shooting. These sport shooters may find themselves temporarily unable to participate in the sport if their primary means of participating is with a newly prohibited firearm. Sport shooters may already possess or may purchase other firearms suitable for sport shooting, and if they turn in their prohibited firearm during the buy-back program, would receive compensation. Sport shooting contributed an estimated $1.8 billion to Canada's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in 2018, as well as $868 million in labour income, and supports about 14 555 full-time equivalent jobs. These figures may be affected in the short term by the prohibition on certain firearms, but these impacts may be mitigated by increases in purchases of new firearms that are not being prohibited.

In addition, 1.3 million Canadians participate in legal hunting. These owners may also be affected if they have been using a newly prohibited firearm that was previously nonrestricted. If they have been using such a firearm for sustenance hunting or to exercise a right affirmed in section 35 of the Constitution, they may continue to use their firearm for the same purpose, until the end of the amnesty period. Hunting contributes an estimated $4.1 billion to Canada's GDP as well as $2 billion in labour income, and supports about 33 313 full-time equivalent jobs.

The 2018 Commissioner of Firearms Report states that there are 4 442 licenced firearms businesses, of which 2 004 are for ammunition only, not including carriers and museums. Firearms business licences are issued to businesses, museums or organizations that manufacture, sell, possess, handle, display or store firearms or ammunition. The number of small businesses included in these figures is unknown, but likely comprises a large majority. Some of these businesses may see in the short term a decrease in profits as a result of the prohibition. These impacts may be mitigated by the buy-back program and the ability to return prohibited firearms to their manufacturer, and potentially by purchases of new firearms to replace those being prohibited.

restreinte touchés actuellement réside en Alberta, en Colombie-Britannique ou en Ontario. On ne connaît actuellement pas la ventilation régionale des propriétaires touchés des armes à feu actuellement sans restriction puisque celles-ci ne sont pas enregistrées.

Selon un rapport du Conference Board of Canada intitulé « The Economic Footprint of Angling, Hunting, Trapping and Sport Shooting in Canada, » publié en septembre 2019, il y a approximativement 1,4 million de Canadiens qui font du tir sportif légal. Ces tireurs sportifs pourraient se trouver temporairement dans l'impossibilité de participer au sport s'ils utilisent principalement une arme à feu nouvellement prohibée. Des tireurs sportifs peuvent déjà être en possession d'armes à feu convenant au tir sportif, ou pourraient en acheter, et seront indemnisés s'ils remettent leurs armes à feu prohibées dans le cadre du programme de rachat. Le tir sportif a contribué à hauteur de 1,8 milliard de dollars au produit intérieur brut (PIB) en 2018, de 868 millions de dollars en revenu du travail, et soutient environ 14 555 emplois équivalents temps plein. Ces chiffres risquent d'être touchés à court terme par la prohibition de certaines armes à feu; cependant, ces répercussions pourraient être atténuées par une augmentation de l'achat de nouvelles armes à feu qui ne sont pas prohibées.

Par ailleurs, 1,3 million de Canadiens participent à la chasse légale. Ces propriétaires pourraient également être touchés s'ils utilisent une arme à feu nouvellement prohibée qui, auparavant, était une arme à feu sans restriction. S'ils utilisaient une telle arme à feu pour la chasse de subsistance ou l'exercice d'un droit garanti par l'article 35 de la Constitution, ils pourront continuer d'utiliser leur arme à feu à cette fin, jusqu'à la fin de la période d'amnistie. La chasse contribue à hauteur de 4,1 milliards de dollars au PIB du Canada, et de deux milliards de dollars en revenu du travail, et appuie environ 33 313 emplois équivalents temps plein.

Selon le Rapport du commissaire aux armes à feu de 2018, il y avait 4 442 entreprises d'armes à feu titulaires d'un permis; de ce nombre, 2 004 étaient titulaires d'un permis de vente de munitions seulement, sans compter les transporteurs et les musées. Les permis d'armes à feu pour entreprise sont délivrés aux entreprises, aux musées ou aux organismes qui fabriquent, vendent, possèdent, manient, exposent ou entreposent des armes à feu ou des munitions. Le nombre de petites entreprises inclus dans ces chiffres est inconnu, mais en compose vraisemblablement la grande majorité. Certaines de ces entreprises pourraient connaître à court terme une diminution de profits à la suite de la prohibition. Ces répercussions pourraient être atténuées d'une part, par le programme de rachat qui offre aux propriétaires la possibilité de retourner aux fabricants les armes à feu prohibées, et d'autre part, peut-être aussi par les achats de nouvelles armes à feu en remplacement des armes prohibées.

Small business lens

While small businesses may assume some compliance costs arising from these Regulations, the costs are extremely difficult to assess as the inventory held by private businesses is unknown. Some costs may include lost interest from the inability to sell this inventory for a profit and possible restocking fees if the business chooses to return the affected firearms in their inventory to their foreign supplier for reimbursement. Firearms that cannot be exported may be eligible for the buy-back program.

It is likely that businesses selling newly prohibited firearms would experience a reduction in sales and as a result may reduce staff or cease operations. Some businesses may choose to switch to a new product line to replace those firearms. A Conference Board of Canada study completed in September 2019 determined that sport shooting and hunting contribute $5.9 billion to Canada's GDP, as well as $2.9 billion in labour income. The sport shooting and hunting industries also support approximately 48 000 jobs.

One-for-one rule

The one-for-one rule does not apply to these Regulations as there will be no incremental change in administrative burden to business. The Regulations do not introduce new administrative requirements for businesses.

Regulatory cooperation and alignment

As a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO) Canada must comply with different notification obligations before making regulations that could have an impact on trade. These notifications are in addition to Canada's general obligations not to impose prohibitions on the importation or exportation of goods and not to treat some nations more favourably than others unless justified. Specifically, under the WTO's Technical Barriers to Trade (TBT) Agreement, Canada must give notification of proposed regulations within a reasonable time. A WTO member may not be required to follow the normal notification periods under the TBT Agreement under certain circumstances, including urgent circumstances regarding safety, health, environmental protection or national security. The Government of Canada has taken the position that the prohibition of these firearms is a matter of public safety and security therefore Canada has not given the advance notification as required by the WTO. In addition, Canada has not given advance notice in an effort to avoiding Les petites entreprises pourraient avoir à assumer certains coûts découlant du Règlement; toutefois, il est extrêmement difficile d'en prévoir les coûts, car on ne connaît pas l'inventaire détenu par des entreprises privées. Certains coûts pourraient inclure des pertes pécuniaires liées aux frais d'intérêt attribuables à l'impossibilité de vendre à profit cet inventaire, ainsi que des frais de réapprovisionnement possibles si l'entreprise choisit de retourner les armes à feu visées dans son inventaire à son fournisseur étranger pour remboursement. Les armes à feu qui ne peuvent être exportées pourraient être admissibles au programme de rachat.

Il est probable que les entreprises qui vendent des armes à feu nouvellement prohibées connaissent une baisse de ventes, et que, de ce fait, puissent réduire leur personnel ou cesser leurs activités. Certaines entreprises pourraient choisir d'adopter une nouvelle gamme de produits en remplacement de ces armes à feu. Selon une étude du Conference Board of Canada, terminée en septembre 2019, le tir sportif et la chasse contribuent à hauteur de 5,9 milliards de dollars au PIB du Canada, et de 2,9 milliards de dollars en revenu du travail. Les industries du tir sportif et de la chasse soutiennent également approximativement 48 000 emplois.

Règle du « un pour un »

La règle du « un pour un » ne s'applique pas à ce Règlement proposé, car il n'y a pas de changement supplémentaire sur le fardeau administratif des entreprises. Le Règlement ne prévoit pas de nouvelles exigences administratives pour les entreprises.

Coopération et harmonisation en matière de réglementation

En tant que membre de l'Organisation mondiale du commerce (OMC), le Canada doit se conformer à différentes obligations de notification avant de prendre des règlements susceptibles d'avoir une incidence sur le commerce. Ces notifications viennent s'ajouter aux obligations générales qu'a le Canada de ne pas imposer de prohibitions relatives à l'importation ou à l'exportation de marchandises, et de ne pas traiter certains pays plus favorablement que d'autres, à moins que de telles mesures soient justifiées. Tout particulièrement, en vertu de l'Accord sur les Obstacles techniques au Commerce (AOTC) de l'OMC, le Canada est tenu de donner notification d'un règlement projeté, dans un délai raisonnable. Un membre de l'OMC n'est pas tenu de respecter les délais normaux de notification en vertu de l'AOTC dans certaines circonstances, notamment si des problèmes urgents de sécurité, de santé, de protection de l'environnement ou de sécurité nationale se posent. Le gouvernement du Canada est d'avis que la prohibition de ces armes à feu est une question de sécurité creating a potential run on the market before it is frozen by the prohibition.

Strategic environmental assessment

There will be low environmental impacts resulting from the buy-back program and the subsequent disposal/destruction of prohibited firearms.

Gender-based analysis plus (GBA+)

Measures to limit access to firearms are expected to have different impacts on certain populations in Canada, such as males, who are the largest group of firearms owners, and youth, who are overrepresented as perpetrators of firearm-related crime. These measures would benefit both males and females, as about two-thirds of victims of gun violence are male; however, according to Statistics Canada approximately 85% of police-reported victims in 2016 of intimate partner violence incidents involving a firearm were women.

Measures to reduce access to firearms are expected to have a higher impact on western provinces, which experience firearm-related crimes at a higher rate compared to the rest of Canada.

Indigenous persons are victims of homicides involving firearms at a much higher rate than the Canadian population and this figure appears to be increasing. The total number of Indigenous victims of firearms-related homicides rose from 10.4% in 2014 to 13.5% in 2016.

Rationale

The Regulations address gun violence and the threat to public safety by assault-style firearms. The Government of Canada recognizes that their inherent deadliness makes them unsuitable for civilian use and a serious threat to public safety given the degree to which they can increase the severity of mass shootings.

Prescribing these firearms as prohibited supports the Government's objective to ban assault-style firearms and to reduce the risk of diversion to illegal markets for criminal use. The prescribed list represents the most prevalent assault-style firearms in the Canadian market. The list prohibits assault-style firearms within the Canadian market that have semi-automatic action with sustained rapid-fire capability, including the AR-15 and its variants or et de sûreté publiques, par conséquent, le Canada n'a pas donné la notification préalable requise par l'OMC. De plus, le Canada n'a pas donné de préavis afin d'éviter de créer une fuite potentielle sur le marché avant qu'elle ne soit gelée par la prohibition.

Évaluation environnementale stratégique

Il y aura de faibles impacts environnementaux résultant du programme de rachat et de l'élimination / destruction subséquente des armes à feu prohibées.

Analyse comparative entre les sexes plus (ACS+)

Les mesures visant à réduire l'accès aux armes à feu devraient avoir des répercussions différentes sur certains groupes au Canada, comme les hommes, qui constituent le groupe le plus important de propriétaires d'armes à feu au Canada, et les jeunes, qui sont surreprésentés parmi les auteurs de crimes liés aux armes à feu. Ces mesures profiteraient à la fois aux hommes et aux femmes, car environ les deux tiers des victimes de violence armée sont des hommes; toutefois, selon Statistique Canada, en 2016, approximativement 85 % des victimes de violence entre partenaires intimes, impliquant une arme, étaient des femmes.

Les mesures visant à réduire l'accès aux armes à feu devraient avoir une plus grande incidence dans les provinces de l'ouest, où les crimes liés aux armes à feu sont plus fréquents que dans le reste du Canada.

Les Autochtones sont victimes d'homicides liés aux armes à feu dans une proportion beaucoup plus élevée que la population canadienne, et ce chiffre semble augmenter. Le nombre total de victimes autochtones d'homicides liés aux armes à feu est passé de 10,4 % en 2014 à 13,5 % en 2016.

Justification

Le Règlement vise à lutter contre la violence commise au moyen d'armes à feu et la menace à la sécurité publique que présentent les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut. Le gouvernement du Canada reconnaît que le caractère mortel inhérent de telles armes fait qu'elles ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile et qu'elles présentent une menace grave pour la sécurité publique compte tenu du degré auquel elles peuvent accroître la gravité des fusillades de masse.

La prohibition de ces armes à feu appuie l'objectif qu'a le gouvernement de prohiber les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et de réduire le risque de détournement de ces armes vers les marchés illégaux à des fins criminelles. La liste établie représente les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut les plus répandues sur le marché canadien. La liste établit comme armes à feu prohibées les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut sur le marché canadien, qui ont une modified versions thereof. Any firearm having a 20 mm bore or greater (e.g. grenade launchers) or a capability of discharging a projectile with a muzzle energy above 10 000 joules (e.g. .50 calibre sniper rifles) will also be prohibited.

Prohibiting additional firearms and providing an amnesty for the disposal of prevalent assault-style firearms and other firearms exceeding safe civilian use will respond directly to a key and growing public safety concern that these firearms are not suitable for civilian use as they can and have been used in mass shootings in Canada and internationally. The addition of the newly prohibited firearms to the Classification Regulations aligns with the Government's mandate to ban assault-style firearms and reduce the risk of diversion of firearms to the illegal market.

The prohibited firearms are tactical and/or military-style firearms and are not reasonable for hunting or sport shooting. Individuals may have used some of the listed firearms for hunting purposes on the basis that they were previously classified as non-restricted firearms. In addition, some of the listed firearms may have been used by individuals for sport shooting on the basis that they have been classified as restricted or non-restricted. However, the fact that these firearms are sometimes used for hunting or sport shooting does not supersede the fact that they were built with the intent to be used by the military and are capable of killing a large number of people in a short period of time. Due to the public safety concerns posed by these firearms, they are not reasonable for use in Canada for hunting or sport shooting purposes.

The Regulations also prescribe the upper receivers of M16, AR-10, AR-15 and M4 pattern firearms to be prohibited devices in order to ensure that these firearms cannot easily be used with illicitly manufactured or acquired lower receivers. The M16, AR-10, AR-15 and M4 firearms are modular firearms consisting of the lower receiver assembly, which is the component bearing the serial number and subject to registration and that is now prohibited; and the upper receiver assembly, which is the pressure-bearing component and has not previously been regulated. An owner could possess two or more upper receiver assemblies, which can be mounted and dismounted on a lower receiver assembly according to the needs of the occasion. If upper receivers were not also prohibited, there would be an important public safety risk that the action semi-automatique avec capacité de tir rapide soutenu, y compris le AR-15 et les armes à feu du même modèle qui comportent des variantes ou qui ont subi des modifications. Seront également prohibées les armes à feu ayant une âme de 20 mm ou plus (par ex. lance-grenades) ou pouvant tirer un projectile avec une énergie initiale de plus de 10 000 joules (par ex. un fusil de tireur d'élite de calibre 0,50).

La prohibition d'armes à feu additionnelles et l'amnistie prévue pour la disposition des armes à feu de style arme d'assaut répandues et autres armes à feu excédant une utilisation civile sécuritaire permettront de répondre directement à une préoccupation importante et grandissante en matière de sécurité publique, à savoir que ces armes à feu ne conviennent pas à une utilisation civile puisqu'elles peuvent être utilisées, et l'ont été, dans des fusillades de masse au Canada et à l'étranger. L'adjonction d'armes à feu nouvelles prohibées au Règlement sur la classification s'inscrit dans la foulée du mandat qu'a le gouvernement de prohiber les armes à feu de style arme d'assaut et de réduire le risque de détournement des armes à feu vers le marché illégal.

Les armes à feu prohibées sont des armes à feu de style tactique et/ou militaire et ne conviennent pas pour la chasse ou le tir sportif. Il se peut que des particuliers aient utilisé certaines des armes énumérées à des fins de chasse puisqu'elles étaient auparavant classées comme armes à feu sans restriction. De plus, certaines des armes à feu énumérées peuvent avoir été utilisées par des particuliers à des fins de tir sportif du fait qu'elles étaient classées comme armes à feu à autorisation restreinte ou armes à feu sans restriction. Toutefois, le fait que ces armes à feu soient parfois utilisées à des fins de chasse ou de tir sportif ne remplace pas celui qu'elles ont été construites dans l'intention d'être utilisées par des militaires, et qu'elles ont la capacité de tuer un grand nombre de personnes en un court laps de temps. En raison des problèmes de sécurité publique que posent ces armes à feu, il ne convient pas de les utiliser au Canada à des fins de chasse ou de tir sportif.

Le Règlement prévoit aussi que les carcasses supérieures des armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 et M4 sont des dispositifs prohibés afin de veiller à ce que ces armes à feu ne puissent être facilement utilisées avec des carcasses inférieures fabriquées ou acquises illicitement. Les armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 et M4 sont des armes à feu modulaires composées de l'assemblage de la carcasse inférieure, qui est la composante portant le numéro de série faisant l'objet de l'enregistrement, qui est maintenant prohibée; l'assemblage de la carcasse supérieure, la composante sous pression, n'avait pas été réglementé auparavant. Un propriétaire peut posséder deux ou plusieurs assemblages de carcasse supérieure qui peuvent être montés et démontés sur un assemblage de carcasse inférieure selon les besoins. Si les carcasses supérieures upper receiver assemblies would be mated with an illegal lower receiver (i.e. smuggled, made from a receiver blank, or manufactured by 3D printing to supply the illegal market) thus creating unmarked untraceable M16, AR-10, AR-15 or M4 firearms, commonly known as "ghost guns." Prohibiting the upper receiver of these rifles will reduce the quantities in circulation and render it much more difficult to illicitly fabricate working firearms.

ne sont pas aussi des dispositifs prohibés, il existerait un important risque pour la sécurité publique du fait que des assemblages de carcasse supérieure seraient couplés à une carcasse inférieure illégale (c.-à-d. passées en contrebande, fabriquées à partir d'une carcasse inachevée, ou fabriquées par impression 3d pour approvisionner le marché illicite), créant ainsi des armes à feu des modèles M16, AR-10, AR-15 ou M4 , non marquées et intraçables, communément appelées « armes fantômes ». Le fait de prévoir que la carcasse supérieure constitue un dispositif prohibé permettra d'en réduire les quantités en circulation et de rendre beaucoup plus difficile la fabrication illicite d'armes à feu qui fonctionnent.

The Amnesty Order encourages compliance with the law and seeks to protect lawful firearms owners who acted in good faith when they acquired the firearms before the coming into force of Regulations and the Amnesty Order. It provides affected owners with a reasonable amount of time to divest themselves of the firearms by any of the means set out in the Amnesty Order. The Government intends to implement a buy-back program which would allow affected owners to declare their intent to participate in the program in order to be eligible for compensation once the owner turns in the firearm. A grandfathering regime would also be made available for owners of the newly prohibited firearms.

Le Décret d'amnistie encourage le respect de la loi et vise à protéger les propriétaires légitimes d'armes à feu qui ont agi de bonne foi lors de l'acquisition des armes à feu avant l'entrée en vigueur du Règlement et du Décret d'amnistie. Il vise à conférer aux propriétaires touchés un délai raisonnable pour se départir de leurs armes à feu par l'un des moyens énumérés dans le Décret. Le gouvernement a l'intention de mettre en œuvre un programme de rachat qui permettrait aux propriétaires touchés de déclarer leur intention de participer au programme afin d'être admissibles à une indemnisation une fois que le propriétaire aura remis l'arme à feu. Un régime de maintien des droits acquis sera également offert aux propriétaires des nouvelles armes à feu nouvellement prohibées.

Implementation, compliance and enforcement, and service standards

Mise en œuvre, conformité et application, et normes de service

The disposal of the prescribed prohibited firearms is dependent on voluntary compliance by affected owners and businesses. Calculation of the compliance rate will be complicated by the lack of information about non-restricted firearms and their owners; the compliance rate for non-restricted firearms will be based on the number of owners who declare themselves to be in possession of one or more affected firearms. The amount of compensation being offered per firearm may also affect the level of compliance. Communications are in place emphasizing the obligation on affected owners to comply with the new prohibitions, and further public communications on the compensation program will follow in the near future.

La disposition des armes à feu prohibées visées dépend de l'observation volontaire par les propriétaires et les entreprises touchés. Le calcul du taux de conformité sera compliqué par le manque d'information sur les armes à feu sans restriction et leurs propriétaires; le taux de conformité pour les armes à feu sans restriction sera fondé sur le nombre de propriétaires qui se déclarent en possession d'une ou de plusieurs des armes à feu visées. Le montant de l'indemnisation offert par arme à feu pourrait aussi avoir une incidence sur le niveau de conformité. Il y a des communications en place qui font ressortir l'obligation que les propriétaires touchés ont de se conformer aux nouvelles prohibitions, et il y aura sous peu d'autres communications publiques sur le programme d'indemnisation.

There is also a risk that affected firearms owners may elect to replace their firearms with models unaffected by the ban, causing a market displacement. This risk may be mitigated by adding additional makes and models to the list of prohibited firearms in the future.

Il existe également un risque que les propriétaires touchés d'armes à feu puissent choisir de remplacer ces armes par des modèles non visés par la prohibition, ce qui pourrait causer une perturbation des échanges commerciaux. Ce risque pourrait être atténué par l'adjonction dans le futur de marques et de modèles additionnels à la liste des armes à feu prohibées.

The amendment to the Classification Regulations and the Amnesty Order come into force on the day on which they are made. The Amnesty Order will expire on April 30, 2022.

La modification du Règlement sur la classification et le Décret d'amnistie entrent en vigueur à la date où ils seront pris. Le Décret d'amnistie prend fin le 30 avril 2022. Ceux

CODE CRIMINEL

C.P. 2020-299 Le 1er mai 2020

Sur recommandation du ministre de la Justice et en vertu du paragraphe 117.14(1)[a] du Code criminel[b], Son Excellence la Gouverneure générale en conseil prend le Décret fixant une période d'amnistie (2020), ci-après.

Décret fixant une période d'amnistie (2020)

Définitions

1 Les définitions qui suivent s'appliquent au présent décret.

arme à feu visée Arme à feu prohibée visée par l'un ou l'autre des alinéas 83a) à p) ou l'un ou l'autre des articles 87 à 96 de la partie 1 de l'annexe du Règlement désignant des armes à feu, armes, éléments ou pièces d'armes, accessoires, chargeurs, munitions et projectiles comme étant prohibés ou à autorisation restreinte. (specified firearm)

dispositif visé Dispositif prohibé visé à l'article 4 de la partie 4 de l'annexe du Règlement désignant des armes à feu, armes, éléments ou pièces d'armes, accessoires, chargeurs, munitions et projectiles comme étant prohibés ou à autorisation restreinte. (specified device)

Amnistie

2 (1) La période d'amnistie prévue au paragraphe (3) est déclarée en vertu de l'article 117.14 du Code criminel en faveur de la personne qui :

a) soit, à la fois :

(i) est, à la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent décret, propriétaire d'une arme à feu visée et titulaire d'un permis délivré en vertu de la Loi sur les armes à feu ou en possession d'une arme à feu visée et titulaire d'un tel permis,

(ii) est, au cours de la période d'amnistie, en possession de l'arme à feu visée,

(iii) demeure, au cours de la période d'amnistie, titulaire du permis pendant qu'elle est en possession de l'arme à feu visée,

restricted firearm, held on the day before the day on which this Order comes into force, a registration certificate for the specified firearm that was issued under the Firearms Act; or

(b) a person who,

(i) owns or possesses a specified device on the day on which this Order comes into force, and

(ii) at any time during the amnesty period, is in possession of the specified device.

Purpose

(2) The purpose of the amnesty period is to permit the person to

(a) deactivate the specified firearm so that it is no longer a firearm or deactivate the specified device so that it is no longer a prohibited device;

(b) deliver the specified firearm or specified device to a police officer for destruction or other disposal;

(c) if the person is not the owner of the specified firearm or specified device, deliver it to its owner;

(d) export the specified firearm or specified device in accordance with all applicable legal requirements, including the legal requirements of the country to which it is exported;

(e) if the person is a business, as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act, return the specified firearm or specified device to the manufacturer;

(f) transport the specified firearm or specified device by vehicle, for the purpose of doing any of the things described in paragraphs (a) to (e), by a route that, in all the circumstances, is reasonably direct, as long as, during transportation,

(i) in the case of a firearm, it is unloaded and no ammunition is present in the vehicle,

(ii) the firearm or device is in the trunk of the vehicle or, if there is no trunk, the firearm or device is not visible from outside the vehicle, and

(iii) the vehicle is not left unattended;

(g) before doing any of the things described in paragraphs (a) to (f), store the specified firearm in accordance with section 5 or 6 of the Storage, Display, Transportation and Handling of Firearms by Individuals Regulations according to the classification of the firearm on the day before the day on which it became a prohibited firearm;

(iv) était, le jour précédant la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent décret, titulaire du certificat d'enregistrement, délivré en vertu de la Loi sur les armes à feu, de l'arme à feu visée, si celle-ci était, ce jour-là, une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte;

b) soit, à la fois :

(i) est, à la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent décret, propriétaire d'un dispositif visé ou en possession d'un dispositif visé,

(ii) est, au cours de la période d'amnistie, en possession du dispositif visé.

Objectifs

(2) La période d'amnistie est déclarée afin de permettre à la personne :

a) de neutraliser l'arme à feu visée de manière à ce qu'elle ne soit plus une arme à feu ou de neutraliser le dispositif visé de façon à ce qu'il ne soit plus un dispositif prohibé;

b) de remettre à un officier de police l'arme à feu visée ou le dispositif visé pour qu'il en soit disposé par destruction ou autrement;

c) de remettre l'arme à feu visée ou le dispositif visé à son propriétaire, si la personne n'en est pas le propriétaire;

d) d'exporter l'arme à feu visée ou le dispositif visé conformément aux exigences légales applicables, y compris celles du pays d'exportation;

e) si la personne est une entreprise au sens du paragraphe 2(1) de la Loi sur les armes à feu, de retourner l'arme à feu visée ou le dispositif visé au fabricant;

f) de transporter, afin de faire toute chose visée à l'un des alinéas a) à e), l'arme à feu visée ou le dispositif visé dans un véhicule selon un itinéraire qu'il est raisonnable, dans toutes les circonstances, de considérer comme direct, si les conditions ci-après sont remplies lors du transport :

(i) dans le cas d'une arme à feu, elle n'est pas chargée et il n'y a aucune munition dans le véhicule,

(ii) l'arme à feu ou le dispositif est dans le coffre du véhicule ou, si le véhicule n'est pas muni d'un coffre, l'arme à feu ou le dispositif n'est pas visible de l'extérieur du véhicule,

(iii) le véhicule n'est pas laissé sans surveillance;

g) d'entreposer l'arme à feu visée conformément aux articles 5 ou 6 du Règlement sur l'entreposage, l'exposition, le transport et le maniement des armes à feu

(h) transport the specified firearm by vehicle, for the purpose of doing the thing described in paragraph (g), by a route that, in all the circumstances, is reasonably direct, as long as, during transportation,

(i) the firearm is unloaded and no ammunition is present in the vehicle,

(ii) the firearm is in the trunk of the vehicle or, if there is no trunk, the firearm is not visible from outside the vehicle, and

(iii) the vehicle is not left unattended;

(i) if the specified firearm was, on the day before the day on which this Order comes into force, a non-restricted firearm, use it to hunt in the exercise of a right recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or to sustain the person or their family — until they are able to obtain another firearm for that use — and, for that purpose, transport the firearm in accordance with section 10 of the Storage, Display, Transportation and Handling of Firearms by Individuals Regulations; and

(j) possess the specified firearm or specified device before doing any of the things described in paragraphs (a) to (i).

h) de transporter, afin de faire la chose visée à l'alinéa g), l'arme à feu visée dans un véhicule selon un itinéraire qu'il est raisonnable, dans toutes les circonstances, de considérer comme direct, si les conditions ci-après sont remplies lors du transport :

(i) l'arme à feu n'est pas chargée et il n'y a aucune munition dans le véhicule,

(ii) l'arme à feu est dans le coffre du véhicule ou, si le véhicule n'est pas muni d'un coffre, l'arme à feu n'est pas visible de l'extérieur du véhicule,

(iii) le véhicule n'est pas laissé sans surveillance;

i) si l'arme à feu visée était, le jour précédant la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent décret, une arme à feu sans restriction, de l'utiliser pour la chasse dans le cadre de l'exercice de droits reconnus et confirmés par l'article 35 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 ou pour la chasse afin de subvenir à ses besoins ou à ceux de sa famille, et ce, jusqu'à ce que la personne puisse obtenir une autre arme à feu pour cette utilisation ainsi que, en vue de cette utilisation, de la transporter conformément à l'article 10 du Règlement sur l'entreposage, l'exposition, le transport et le maniement des armes à feu par des particuliers;

j) d'être en possession de l'arme à feu visée ou du dispositif visé avant de faire toute chose visée à l'un des alinéas a) à i).

Barrel length

(2) For the purposes of this Part, the length of a barrel of a firearm is

(a) in the case of a revolver, the distance from the muzzle of the barrel to the breach end immediately in front of the cylinder, and

(b) in any other case, the distance from the muzzle of the barrel to and including the chamber, but does not include the length of any component, part or accessory including any component, part or accessory designed or intended to suppress the muzzle flash or reduce recoil.

Longueur du canon

(2) Pour l'application de la présente partie, la longueur du canon se mesure :

a) pour un revolver, par la distance entre la bouche du canon et la tranche de la culasse devant le barillet;

b) pour les autres armes à feu, par la distance entre la bouche du canon et la chambre, y compris celle-ci.

N'est pas comprise la longueur de tout élément, pièce ou accessoire, notamment tout élément, pièce ou accessoire propre ou destiné à étouffer la lueur de départ ou à amortir le recul.

Certain weapons deemed not to be firearms

(3) For the purposes of sections 91 to 95, 99 to 101, 103 to 107 and 117.03 of this Act and the provisions of the Firearms Act, the following weapons are deemed not to be firearms:

(a) any antique firearm;

(b) any device that is

(i) designed exclusively for signalling, for notifying of distress, for firing blank cartridges or for firing stud cartridges, explosive-driven rivets or other industrial projectiles, and

(ii) intended by the person in possession of it to be used exclusively for the purpose for which it is designed;

(c) any shooting device that is

(i) designed exclusively for the slaughtering of domestic animals, the tranquillizing of animals or the discharging of projectiles with lines attached to them, and

(ii) intended by the person in possession of it to be used exclusively for the purpose for which it is designed; and

(d) any other barrelled weapon, where it is proved that the weapon is not designed or adapted to discharge

(i) a shot, bullet or other projectile at a muzzle velocity exceeding 152.4 m per second or at a muzzle energy exceeding 5.7 Joules, or

(ii) a shot, bullet or other projectile that is designed or adapted to attain a velocity exceeding 152.4 m per second or an energy exceeding 5.7 Joules.

Armes réputées ne pas être des armes à feu

(3) Pour l'application des articles 91 à 95, 99 à 101, 103 à 107 et 117.03 et des dispositions de la Loi sur les armes à feu, sont réputés ne pas être des armes à feu :

a) les armes à feu historiques;

b) tout instrument conçu exclusivement pour envoyer un signal, appeler au secours ou tirer des cartouches à blanc ou pour tirer des cartouches d'ancrage, des rivets explosifs ou autres projectiles industriels, et destiné par son possesseur à servir exclusivement à ces fins;

c) tout instrument de tir conçu exclusivement pour soit abattre des animaux domestiques, soit administrer des tranquillisants à des animaux, soit encore tirer des projectiles auxquels des fils sont attachés, et destiné par son possesseur à servir exclusivement à ces fins;

d) toute autre arme pourvue d'un canon dont il est démontré qu'elle n'est ni conçue ni adaptée pour tirer du plomb, des balles ou tout autre projectile à une vitesse initiale de plus de 152,4 m par seconde ou dont l'énergie initiale est de plus de 5,7 joules ou pour tirer du plomb, des balles ou tout autre projectile conçus ou adaptés pour atteindre une vitesse de plus de 152,4 m par seconde ou une énergie de plus de 5,7 joules.

Exception — antique firearms

(3.1) Notwithstanding subsection (3), an antique firearm is a firearm for the purposes of regulations made under paragraph 117(h) of the Firearms Act and subsection 86(2) of this Act.

Exception — arme à feu historique

(3.1) Par dérogation au paragraphe (3), une arme à feu historique est une arme à feu pour l'application des règlements pris en application de l'alinéa 117h) de la Loi sur les armes à feu et le paragraphe 86(2) de la présente loi.

Meaning of holder

(4) For the purposes of this Part, a person is the holder of

(a) an authorization or a licence if the authorization or licence has been issued to the person and the person continues to hold it; and

(4) Pour l'application de la présente partie, est titulaire :

a) d'une autorisation ou d'un permis la personne à qui ce document a été délivré, et ce pendant sa durée de validité;

(b) a registration certificate for a firearm if

(i) the registration certificate has been issued to the person and the person continues to hold it, or

(ii) the person possesses the registration certificate with the permission of its lawful holder.

b) du certificat d'enregistrement d'une arme à feu la personne à qui ce document a été délivré, et ce pendant sa durée de validité, ou quiconque le détient avec la permission de celle-ci pendant cette période.

Subsequent offences

(5) In determining, for the purpose of subsection 85(3), 95(2), 99(2), 100(2) or 103(2), whether a convicted person has committed a second or subsequent offence, if the person was earlier convicted of any of the following offences, that offence is to be considered as an earlier offence:

(a) an offence under section 85, 95, 96, 98, 98.1, 99, 100, 102 or 103 or subsection 117.01(1);

(b) an offence under section 244 or 244.2; or

(c) an offence under section 220, 236, 239, 272 or 273, subsection 279(1) or section 279.1, 344 or 346 if a firearm was used in the commission of the offence.

However, an earlier offence shall not be taken into account if 10 years have elapsed between the day on which the person was convicted of the earlier offence and the day on which the person was convicted of the offence for which sentence is being imposed, not taking into account any time in custody.

Récidive

(5) Lorsqu'il s'agit de décider, pour l'application des paragraphes 85(3), 95(2), 99(2), 100(2) ou 103(2), si la personne déclarée coupable se trouve en état de récidive, il est tenu compte de toute condamnation antérieure à l'égard :

a) d'une infraction prévue aux articles 85, 95, 96, 98, 98.1, 99, 100, 102 ou 103 ou au paragraphe 117.01(1);

b) d'une infraction prévue aux articles 244 ou 244.2;

c) d'une infraction prévue aux articles 220, 236, 239, 272 ou 273, au paragraphe 279(1) ou aux articles 279.1, 344 ou 346, s'il y a usage d'une arme à feu lors de la perpétration.

Toutefois, il n'est pas tenu compte des condamnations précédant de plus de dix ans la condamnation à l'égard de laquelle la peine doit être déterminée, compte non tenu du temps passé sous garde.

Sequence of convictions only

(6) For the purposes of subsection (5), the only question to be considered is the sequence of convictions and no consideration shall be given to the sequence of commission of offences or whether any offence occurred before or after any conviction.

Discretionary prohibition order

110 (1) Where a person is convicted, or discharged under section 730, of

(a) an offence, other than an offence referred to in any of paragraphs 109(1)(a) to (c.1), in the commission of which violence against a person was used, threatened or attempted, or the court that sentences the person or directs that the person be discharged, as the case may be, shall, in addition to any other punishment that may be imposed for that offence or any other condition prescribed in the order of discharge, consider whether it is desirable, in the interests of the safety of the person or of any other person, to make an order prohibiting the person from possessing any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, or all such things, and where the court decides that it is so desirable, the court shall so order.

Duration of prohibition order

(2) An order made under subsection (1) against a person begins on the day on which the order is made and ends not later than ten years after the person's release from imprisonment after conviction for the offence to which the order relates or, if the person is not then imprisoned or subject to imprisonment, after the person's conviction for or discharge from the offence.

Exception

(2.1) Despite subsection (2), an order made under subsection (1) may be imposed for life or for any shorter duration if, in the commission of the offence, violence was used, threatened or attempted against

(a) the person's intimate partner;

(b) a child or parent of the person or of anyone referred to in paragraph (a); or

(c) any person who resides with the person or with anyone referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

Ordonnance d'interdiction discrétionnaire

110 (1) Le tribunal doit, s'il en arrive à la conclusion qu'il est souhaitable pour la sécurité du contrevenant ou pour celle d'autrui de le faire, en plus de toute autre peine qu'il lui inflige ou de toute autre condition qu'il lui impose dans l'ordonnance d'absolution, rendre une ordonnance lui interdisant d'avoir en sa possession des armes à feu, arbalètes, armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées et substances explosives, ou l'un ou plusieurs de ces objets, lorsqu'il le déclare coupable ou l'absout en vertu de l'article 730 :

a) soit d'une infraction, autre que celle visée à l'un des alinéas 109(1)a) à c.1), perpétrée avec usage, tentative ou menace de violence contre autrui;

b) soit d'une infraction relative à une arme à feu, une arbalète, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions, des munitions prohibées ou des substances explosives, perpétrée alors que celui-ci n'est pas sous le coup d'une ordonnance, rendue en vertu de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale, lui en interdisant la possession.

Durée de l'ordonnance

(2) Le cas échéant, la période d'interdiction — commençant sur-le-champ — expire au plus tard dix ans après la libération du contrevenant ou, s'il n'est pas emprisonné ni passible d'emprisonnement, après sa déclaration de culpabilité ou son absolution.

Exception

(2.1) Malgré le paragraphe (2), l'ordonnance d'interdiction peut s'appliquer soit à perpétuité soit pour toute autre période plus courte si l'infraction a été perpétrée avec usage, tentative ou menace de violence contre l'une des personnes suivantes :

a) le partenaire intime du contrevenant;

b) l'enfant, le père ou la mère du contrevenant ou de l'une des personnes mentionnées à l'alinéa a);

c) toute personne qui réside avec le contrevenant ou l'une des personnes mentionnées aux alinéas a) ou b).

Reasons

(3) Where the court does not make an order under subsection (1), or where the court does make such an order but does not prohibit the possession of everything referred to in that subsection, the court shall include in the record a statement of the court's reasons for not doing so.

Definition of release from imprisonment

(4) In subsection (2), release from imprisonment means release from confinement by reason of expiration of sentence, commencement of statutory release or grant of parole.

Application of ss. 113 to 117

(5) Sections 113 to 117 apply in respect of every order made under subsection (1).

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 110; 1991, c. 40, ss. 23, 40; 1995, c. 39, ss. 139, 190; 2015, c. 27, s. 31; 2018, c. 16, s. 209; 2019, c. 25, s. 31.

110.1 [Repealed, 2019, c. 25, s. 32]

Application for prohibition order

111 (1) A peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer may apply to a provincial court judge for an order prohibiting a person from possessing any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, or all such things, where the peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer believes on reasonable grounds that it is not desirable in the interests of the safety of the person against whom the order is sought or of any other person that the person against whom the order is sought should possess any such thing.

Date for hearing and notice

(2) On receipt of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge shall fix a date for the hearing of the application and direct that notice of the hearing be given, in such manner as the provincial court judge may specify, to the person against whom the order is sought.

Hearing of application

(3) Subject to subsection (4), at the hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge shall hear all relevant evidence presented by or on behalf of the applicant and the person against whom the order is sought.

Where hearing may proceed ex parte

(4) A provincial court judge may proceed ex parte to hear and determine an application made under subsection (1) in the absence of the person against whom the

Motifs

(3) S'il ne rend pas d'ordonnance ou s'il en rend une dont l'interdiction ne vise pas tous les objets visés au paragraphe (1), le tribunal est tenu de donner ses motifs, qui sont consignés au dossier de l'instance.

Définition de libération

(4) Au paragraphe (2), libération s'entend de l'élargissement entraîné par l'expiration de la peine ou le début soit de la libération d'office soit d'une libération conditionnelle.

Application des articles 113 à 117

(5) Les articles 113 à 117 s'appliquent à l'ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe (1).

L.R. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 110; 1991, ch. 40, art. 23 et 40; 1995, ch. 39, art. 139 et 190; 2015, ch. 27, art. 31; 2018, ch. 16, art. 209; 2019, ch. 25, art. 31.

Demande d'une ordonnance d'interdiction

111 (1) L'agent de la paix, le préposé aux armes à feu ou le contrôleur des armes à feu peut demander à un juge de la cour provinciale de rendre une ordonnance interdisant à une personne d'avoir en sa possession des armes à feu, arbalètes, armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées et substances explosives, ou l'un ou plusieurs de ces objets, s'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'il ne serait pas souhaitable pour la sécurité de qui que ce soit que celle-ci soit autorisée à les avoir en sa possession.

Date d'audition et avis

(2) Sur réception de la demande, le juge fixe la date à laquelle il l'entendra et ordonne que la personne visée par l'interdiction demandée en soit avisée de la manière qu'il indique.

Audition de la demande

(3) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), à l'audition, le juge prend connaissance de tout élément de preuve pertinent que présentent l'auteur de la demande et la personne visée par celle-ci, ou leurs procureurs.

Audition ex parte

(4) Il peut entendre ex parte la demande et la trancher en l'absence de la personne visée par la demande, dans les cas où les cours des poursuites sommaires peuvent, order is sought in the same circumstances as those in which a summary conviction court may, under Part XXVII, proceed with a trial in the absence of the defendant.

en vertu de la partie XXVII, tenir le procès en l'absence du défendeur.

Prohibition order

(5) Where, at the conclusion of a hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge is satisfied that the circumstances referred to in that subsection exist, the provincial court judge shall make an order prohibiting the person from possessing any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, or all such things, for such period, not exceeding five years, as is specified in the order, beginning on the day on which the order is made.

Ordonnance d'interdiction

(5) Si, au terme de l'audition, il est convaincu de l'existence des motifs visés au paragraphe (1), le juge rend une ordonnance interdisant à la personne visée d'avoir en sa possession des armes à feu, arbalètes, armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées et substances explosives, ou l'un ou plusieurs de ces objets, pour la période prévue dans l'ordonnance, qui est d'au plus cinq ans à compter de la date où elle est rendue.

Reasons

(6) Where a provincial court judge does not make an order under subsection (1), or where a provincial court judge does make such an order but does not prohibit the possession of everything referred to in that subsection, the provincial court judge shall include in the record a statement of the court's reasons.

Motifs

(6) S'il ne rend pas d'ordonnance ou s'il en rend une dont l'interdiction ne vise pas tous les objets prévus au paragraphe (1), le juge est tenu de donner ses motifs, qui sont consignés au dossier de l'instance.

Application of ss. 113 to 117

(7) Sections 113 to 117 apply in respect of every order made under subsection (5).

Application des articles 113 à 117

(7) Les articles 113 à 117 s'appliquent à l'ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe (5).

Appeal by person or Attorney General

(8) Where a provincial court judge makes an order under subsection (5), the person to whom the order relates, or the Attorney General, may appeal to the superior court against the order.

Appel d'une ordonnance

(8) La personne visée par l'ordonnance d'interdiction et le procureur général peuvent en interjeter appel devant la cour supérieure.

Appeal by Attorney General

(9) Where a provincial court judge does not make an order under subsection (5), the Attorney General may appeal to the superior court against the decision not to make an order.

Appel du refus de rendre une ordonnance

(9) Lorsque le juge de la cour provinciale ne rend pas l'ordonnance d'interdiction, le procureur général peut interjeter appel de cette décision devant la cour supérieure.

Application of Part XXVII to appeals

(10) The provisions of Part XXVII, except sections 785 to 812, 816 to 819 and 829 to 838, apply in respect of an appeal made under subsection (8) or (9), with such modifications as the circumstances require and as if each reference in that Part to the appeal court were a reference to the superior court.

Application de la partie XXVII

(10) La partie XXVII, sauf les articles 785 à 812, 816 à 819 et 829 à 838, s'applique, avec les adaptations nécessaires, aux appels interjetés en application des paragraphes (8) ou (9) et la mention de la cour d'appel dans cette partie vaut celle de la cour supérieure.

Revocation of prohibition order under s. 111(5)

112 A provincial court judge may, on application by the person against whom an order is made under subsection 111(5), revoke the order if satisfied that the circumstances for which it was made have ceased to exist.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 112; R.S., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 203; 1991, c. 40, s. 26; 1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Révocation de l'ordonnance prévue au paragraphe 111(5)

112 Le juge de la cour provinciale peut, sur demande de la personne visée par une ordonnance d'interdiction rendue en application du paragraphe 111(5), révoquer l'ordonnance lorsqu'il est convaincu qu'elle n'est plus justifiée eu égard aux circonstances.

Lifting of prohibition order for sustenance or employment

113 (1) Where a person who is or will be a person against whom a prohibition order is made establishes to the satisfaction of a competent authority that

(a) the person needs a firearm or restricted weapon to hunt or trap in order to sustain the person or the person's family, or

(b) a prohibition order against the person would constitute a virtual prohibition against employment in the only vocation open to the person, the competent authority may, notwithstanding that the person is or will be subject to a prohibition order, make an order authorizing a chief firearms officer or the Registrar to issue, in accordance with such terms and conditions as the competent authority considers appropriate, an authorization, a licence or a registration certificate, as the case may be, to the person for sustenance or employment purposes.

113 (1) La juridiction compétente peut rendre une ordonnance autorisant le contrôleur des armes à feu ou le directeur à délivrer à une personne qui est ou sera visée par une ordonnance d'interdiction, une autorisation, un permis ou un certificat d'enregistrement, selon le cas, aux conditions qu'elle estime indiquées, si cette personne la convainc :

a) soit de la nécessité pour elle de posséder une arme à feu ou une arme à autorisation restreinte pour chasser, notamment à la trappe, afin d'assurer sa subsistance ou celle de sa famille;

b) soit du fait que l'ordonnance d'interdiction équivaudrait à une interdiction de travailler dans son seul domaine possible d'emploi.

Factors

(2) A competent authority may make an order under subsection (1) only after taking the following factors into account:

(a) the criminal record, if any, of the person;

(b) the nature and circumstances of the offence, if any, in respect of which the prohibition order was or will be made; and

(c) the safety of the person and of other persons.

Critères

(2) La juridiction compétente peut rendre l'ordonnance après avoir tenu compte :

a) du casier judiciaire de cette personne, s'il y a lieu;

b) le cas échéant, de la nature de l'infraction à l'origine de l'ordonnance d'interdiction et des circonstances dans lesquelles elle a été commise;

c) de la sécurité de toute personne.

Effect of order

(3) Where an order is made under subsection (1),

(a) an authorization, a licence or a registration certificate may not be denied to the person in respect of

Conséquences de l'ordonnance

(3) Une fois l'ordonnance rendue :

a) la personne visée par celle-ci ne peut se voir refuser la délivrance d'une autorisation, d'un permis ou d'un whom the order was made solely on the basis of a prohibition order against the person or the commission of an offence in respect of which a prohibition order was made against the person; and

(b) an authorization and a licence may, for the duration of the order, be issued to the person in respect of whom the order was made only for sustenance or employment purposes and, where the order sets out terms and conditions, only in accordance with those terms and conditions, but, for greater certainty, the authorization or licence may also be subject to terms and conditions set by the chief firearms officer that are not inconsistent with the purpose for which it is issued and any terms and conditions set out in the order.

certificat d'enregistrement du seul fait qu'elle est sous le coup d'une ordonnance d'interdiction ou a perpétré une infraction à l'origine d'une telle ordonnance;

b) l'autorisation ou le permis ne peut être délivré, pour la durée de l'ordonnance, qu'aux seules fins de subsistance ou d'emploi et, s'il y a lieu, qu'en conformité avec les conditions de l'ordonnance, étant entendu qu'il peut aussi être assorti de toute autre condition fixée par le contrôleur des armes à feu, qui n'est pas incompatible avec ces fins et conditions.

When order can be made

(4) For greater certainty, an order under subsection (1) may be made during proceedings for an order under subsection 109(1), 110(1), 111(5), 117.05(4) or 515(2), paragraph 732.1(3)(d) or subsection 810(3).

Meaning of competent authority

(5) In this section, competent authority means the competent authority that made or has jurisdiction to make the prohibition order.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 113; 1991, c. 40, s. 27(E); 1995, c. 22, s. 10, c. 39, ss. 139, 190.

Quand l'ordonnance peut être rendue

(4) Il demeure entendu que l'ordonnance peut être rendue lorsque des procédures sont engagées en application des paragraphes 109(1), 110(1), 111(5), 117.05(4) ou 515(2), de l'alinéa 732.1(3)d) ou du paragraphe 810(3).

Sens de juridiction compétente

(5) Au présent article, juridiction compétente s'entend de la juridiction qui a rendu l'ordonnance d'interdiction ou a la compétence pour la rendre.

L.R. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 113; 1991, ch. 40, art. 27(A); 1995, ch. 22, art. 10, ch. 39, art. 139 et 190.

Requirement to surrender

114 A competent authority that makes a prohibition order against a person may, in the order, require the person to surrender to a peace officer, a firearms officer or a chief firearms officer

(a) any thing the possession of which is prohibited by the order that is in the possession of the person on the commencement of the order, and

(b) every authorization, licence and registration certificate relating to any thing the possession of which is prohibited by the order that is held by the person on the commencement of the order, and where the competent authority does so, it shall specify in the order a reasonable period for surrendering such things and documents and during which section 117.01 does not apply to that person.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 114; R.S., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 203; 1995, c. 22, s. 10, c. 39, s. 139.

Remise obligatoire

114 La juridiction qui rend une ordonnance d'interdiction peut l'assortir d'une obligation pour la personne visée de remettre à un agent de la paix, à un préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à feu :

a) tout objet visé par l'interdiction en sa possession à la date de l'ordonnance;

b) les autorisations, permis et certificats d'enregistrement — dont elle est titulaire à la date de l'ordonnance — afférents à ces objets.

Le cas échéant, l'ordonnance prévoit un délai raisonnable pour remettre les objets et les documents, durant lequel l'article 117.01 ne s'applique pas à cette personne.

115 (1) Unless a prohibition order against a person specifies otherwise, every thing the possession of which is prohibited by the order is forfeited to Her Majesty if, on the commencement of the order, the thing is in the

Confiscation

115 (1) Sauf indication contraire de l'ordonnance d'interdiction, les objets visés par celle-ci sont confisqués au profit de Sa Majesté si, à la date de l'ordonnance, ils sont person's possession or has been seized and detained by, or surrendered to, a peace officer.

Exception

(1.1) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of an order made under section 515.

Disposal

(2) Every thing forfeited to Her Majesty under subsection (1) shall be disposed of or otherwise dealt with as the Attorney General directs.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 115; 1995, c. 39, s. 139; 2003, c. 8, s. 5; 2019, c. 9, s. 17.

Authorizations revoked or amended

116 (1) Subject to subsection (2), every authorization, licence and registration certificate relating to any thing the possession of which is prohibited by a prohibition order and issued to a person against whom the prohibition order is made is, on the commencement of the prohibition order, revoked, or amended, as the case may be, to the extent of the prohibitions in the order.

Duration of revocation or amendment — orders under section 515

(2) An authorization, a licence and a registration certificate relating to a thing the possession of which is prohibited by an order made under section 515 is revoked, or amended, as the case may be, only in respect of the period during which the order is in force.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 116; 1991, c. 28, s. 11, c. 40, ss. 28, 41; 1995, c. 39, s. 139; 2003, c. 8, s. 6.

Return to owner

117 Where the competent authority that makes a prohibition order or that would have had jurisdiction to make the order is, on application for an order under this section, satisfied that a person, other than the person against whom a prohibition order was or will be made,

(a) is the owner of any thing that is or may be forfeited to Her Majesty under subsection 115(1) and is lawfully entitled to possess it, and

(b) in the case of a prohibition order under subsection 109(1) or 110(1), had no reasonable grounds to believe that the thing would or might be used in the commission of the offence in respect of which the prohibition order was made, the competent authority shall order that the thing be returned to the owner or the proceeds of any sale of the thing be paid to that owner or, if the thing was destroyed, that an amount equal to the value of the thing be paid to the owner.

R.S., 1985, c. C-46, s. 117; 1991, c. 40, s. 29; 1995, c. 39, s. 139.

en la possession de l'intéressé ou ils ont été saisis et retenus par un agent de la paix ou remis à un tel agent.

Exception

(1.1) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux ordonnances rendues en vertu de l'article 515.

Disposition

(2) Le cas échéant, il peut en être disposé selon les instructions du procureur général.

L.R. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 115; 1995, ch. 39, art. 139; 2003, ch. 8, art. 5; 2019, ch. 9, art. 17.

Révocation ou modification des autorisations ou autres documents

116 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2), toute ordonnance d'interdiction emporte sans délai la révocation ou la modification — dans la mesure qu'elle précise — des autorisations, permis et certificats d'enregistrement délivrés à la personne visée par celle-ci et afférents aux objets visés par l'interdiction.

Durée de la révocation ou de la modification — ordonnances rendues en vertu de l'art. 515

(2) L'ordonnance rendue en vertu de l'article 515 n'emporte la révocation ou la modification que pour la période de validité de l'ordonnance.

L.R. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 116; 1991, ch. 28, art. 11, ch. 40, art. 28 et 41; 1995, ch. 39, art. 139; 2003, ch. 8, art. 6.

Restitution au propriétaire

117 La juridiction qui a rendu l'ordonnance d'interdiction ou qui aurait eu compétence pour le faire doit ordonner que les objets confisqués en application du paragraphe 115(1) ou susceptibles de l'être soient rendus à un tiers qui lui en fait la demande ou que le produit de leur vente soit versé à ce dernier ou, si les objets ont été détruits, qu'une somme égale à leur valeur lui soit versée, si elle est convaincue :

a) que celui-ci est le propriétaire légitime de ces objets et qu'il peut légalement les avoir en sa possession;

b) dans le cas d'une ordonnance rendue en application des paragraphes 109(1) ou 110(1), que celui-ci n'avait aucun motif raisonnable de croire que ces objets seraient ou pourraient être employés pour la perpétration de l'infraction à l'origine de l'ordonnance d'interdiction.

Possession contrary to order

117.01 (1) Subject to subsection (4), every person commits an offence who possesses a firearm, a cross-bow, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device, any ammunition, any prohibited ammunition or an explosive substance while the person is prohibited from doing so by any order made under this Act or any other Act of Parliament.

Failure to surrender authorization, etc.

(2) Every person commits an offence who wilfully fails to surrender to a peace officer, a firearms officer or a chief firearms officer any authorization, licence or registration certificate held by the person when the person is required to do so by any order made under this Act or any other Act of Parliament.

Punishment

(3) Every person who commits an offence under subsection (1) or (2)

(a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years; or

(b) is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Exception

(4) Subsection (1) does not apply to a person who possessed a firearm in accordance with an authorization or licence issued to the person as the result of an order made under subsection 113(1).

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Limitations on Access

Application for order

117.011 (1) A peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer may apply to a provincial court judge for an order under this section where the peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer believes on reasonable grounds that

(a) the person against whom the order is sought cohabits with, or is an associate of, another person who is prohibited by any order made under this Act or any other Act of Parliament from possessing any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, or all such things; and

117.01 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), commet une infraction quiconque a en sa possession une arme à feu, une arbalète, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions, des munitions prohibées ou des substances explosives pendant que cela lui est interdit par une ordonnance rendue sous le régime de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale.

Défaut de remettre les autorisations ou autres documents

(2) Commet une infraction quiconque sciemment n'exécute pas l'obligation que lui impose une ordonnance rendue sous le régime de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale de remettre à un agent de la paix, à un préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à feu une autorisation, un permis ou un certificat d'enregistrement dont il est titulaire.

Peine

(3) Quiconque commet l'infraction prévue au paragraphe (1) ou (2) est coupable :

a) soit d'un acte criminel passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de dix ans;

b) soit d'une infraction punissable sur déclaration de culpabilité par procédure sommaire.

Réserve

(4) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas à une personne qui, conformément à une autorisation ou un permis qui lui a été délivré en vertu d'une ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe 113(1), a en sa possession une arme à feu.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Ordonnance de restriction

Demande d'ordonnance

117.011 (1) L'agent de la paix, le préposé aux armes à feu ou le contrôleur des armes à feu peut demander à un juge de la cour provinciale de rendre une ordonnance en vertu du présent article s'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire que la personne visée par la demande habite ou a des rapports avec un particulier qui est sous le coup d'une ordonnance, rendue en vertu de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale, lui interdisant d'avoir en sa possession des armes à feu, arbalètes, armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées et substances explosives, ou l'un ou plusieurs de ces objets, et qui aurait ou pourrait avoir accès à de tels objets que celle-ci a en sa possession.

(b) the other person would or might have access to any such thing that is in the possession of the person against whom the order is sought.

Date for hearing and notice

(2) On receipt of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge shall fix a date for the hearing of the application and direct that notice of the hearing be given, in such manner as the provincial court judge may specify, to the person against whom the order is sought.

Date d'audition et avis

(2) Sur réception de la demande, le juge fixe la date à laquelle il l'entendra et ordonne que la personne visée par la demande en soit avisée de la manière qu'il indique.

Hearing of application

(3) Subject to subsection (4), at the hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge shall hear all relevant evidence presented by or on behalf of the applicant and the person against whom the order is sought.

Audition de la demande

(3) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), le juge prend connaissance, à l'audition, de tout élément de preuve pertinent que présentent l'auteur de la demande et la personne visée par celle-ci, ou leurs procureurs.

Where hearing may proceed ex parte

(4) A provincial court judge may proceed ex parte to hear and determine an application made under subsection (1) in the absence of the person against whom the order is sought in the same circumstances as those in which a summary conviction court may, under Part XXVII, proceed with a trial in the absence of the defendant.

Audition ex parte

Order

(5) Where, at the conclusion of a hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the provincial court judge is satisfied that the circumstances referred to in that subsection exist, the provincial court judge shall make an order in respect of the person against whom the order was sought imposing such terms and conditions on the person's use and possession of anything referred to in subsection (1) as the provincial court judge considers appropriate.

Ordonnance

(5) Si, au terme de l'audition, il est convaincu de l'existence des motifs visés au paragraphe (1), le juge rend une ordonnance imposant à la personne visée les conditions qu'il estime indiquées relativement à l'utilisation ou à la possession de tout objet visé à ce paragraphe.

Terms and conditions

(6) In determining terms and conditions under subsection (5), the provincial court judge shall impose terms and conditions that are the least intrusive as possible, bearing in mind the purpose of the order.

Conditions

(6) Toutefois, compte tenu de l'objet de l'ordonnance, le juge impose des conditions aussi libérales que possible.

Appeal by person or Attorney General

(7) Where a provincial court judge makes an order under subsection (5), the person to whom the order relates, or the Attorney General, may appeal to the superior court against the order.

Appel d'une ordonnance

(7) La personne visée par l'ordonnance et le procureur général peuvent en interjeter appel devant la cour supérieure.

Appeal by Attorney General

(8) Where a provincial court judge does not make an order under subsection (5), the Attorney General may appeal to the superior court against the decision not to make an order.

Application of Part XXVII to appeals

(9) The provisions of Part XXVII, except sections 785 to 812, 816 to 819 and 829 to 838, apply in respect of an appeal made under subsection (7) or (8), with such modifications as the circumstances require and as if each reference in that Part to the appeal court were a reference to the superior court.

Revocation of order under s. 117.011

117.012 A provincial court judge may, on application by the person against whom an order is made under subsection 117.011(5), revoke the order if satisfied that the circumstances for which it was made have ceased to exist.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Search and Seizure

Search and seizure without warrant where offence committed

117.02 (1) Where a peace officer believes on reasonable grounds

(a) that a weapon, an imitation firearm, a prohibited device, any ammunition, any prohibited ammunition or an explosive substance was used in the commission of an offence, or

(b) that an offence is being committed, or has been committed, under any provision of this Act that involves, or the subject-matter of which is, a firearm, an imitation firearm, a cross-bow, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or an explosive substance, and evidence of the offence is likely to be found on a person, in a vehicle or in any place or premises other than a dwelling-house, the peace officer may, where the conditions for obtaining a warrant exist but, by reason of exigent circumstances, it would not be practicable to obtain a warrant, search, without warrant, the person, vehicle, place or premises, and seize any thing by means of or in relation to which that peace officer believes on reasonable grounds the offence is being committed or has been committed.

(8) Lorsque le juge de la cour provinciale ne rend pas l'ordonnance, le procureur général peut interjeter appel de cette décision devant la cour supérieure.

Application de la partie XXVII

(9) La partie XXVII, sauf les articles 785 à 812, 816 à 819 et 829 à 838, s'applique, avec les adaptations nécessaires, aux appels interjetés en application des paragraphes (7) ou (8) et la mention de la cour d'appel dans cette partie vaut celle de la cour supérieure.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Révocation de l'ordonnance prévue à l'article 117.011

117.012 Le juge de la cour provinciale peut, sur demande de la personne visée par une ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe 117.011(5), révoquer l'ordonnance lorsqu'il est convaincu qu'elle n'est plus justifiée eu égard aux circonstances.

Perquisition et saisie

Perquisition et saisie sans mandat en cas d'infraction

117.02 (1) Lorsqu'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire à la perpétration d'une infraction avec usage d'une arme, d'une fausse arme à feu, d'un dispositif prohibé, de munitions, de munitions prohibées ou de substances explosives ou d'une infraction à la présente loi relative à une arme à feu, une fausse arme à feu, une arbalète, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions, des munitions prohibées ou des substances explosives et de croire qu'une preuve de celle-ci peut être trouvée sur une personne, dans un véhicule ou en tout lieu, sauf une maison d'habitation, l'agent de la paix, lorsque l'urgence de la situation rend difficilement réalisable l'obtention d'un mandat et que les conditions de délivrance de celui-ci sont réunies, peut, sans mandat, fouiller la personne ou le véhicule, perquisitionner dans ce lieu et saisir tout objet au moyen ou au sujet duquel il a des motifs raisonnables de croire que l'infraction est perpétrée ou l'a été.

Disposition of seized things

(2) Any thing seized pursuant to subsection (1) shall be dealt with in accordance with sections 490 and 491.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Disposition des objets saisis

(2) Il est disposé conformément aux articles 490 et 491 des objets saisis.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Seizure on failure to produce authorization

117.03 (1) Despite section 117.02, a peace officer who finds

(a) a person in possession of a prohibited firearm, a restricted firearm or a non-restricted firearm who fails, on demand, to produce, for inspection by the peace officer, an authorization or a licence under which the person may lawfully possess the firearm and, in the case of a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm, a registration certificate for it, or

(b) a person in possession of a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device or any prohibited ammunition who fails, on demand, to produce, for inspection by the peace officer, an authorization or a licence under which the person may lawfully possess it, may seize the firearm, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device or prohibited ammunition unless its possession by the person in the circumstances in which it is found is authorized by any provision of this Part, or the person is under the direct and immediate supervision of another person who may lawfully possess it.

Saisie à défaut de présenter les documents

117.03 (1) Par dérogation à l'article 117.02, lorsqu'il trouve une personne qui a en sa possession une arme à feu prohibée, une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, une arme à feu sans restriction, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé ou des munitions prohibées et qui est incapable de lui présenter sur-le-champ pour examen une autorisation ou un permis qui l'y autorise, en plus, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, du certificat d'enregistrement de l'arme, l'agent de la paix peut saisir ces objets, à moins que, dans les circonstances, la présente partie n'autorise cette personne à les avoir en sa possession ou que celle-ci ne soit sous la surveillance directe d'une personne pouvant légalement les avoir en sa possession.

Return of seized thing on production of authorization

(2) If a person from whom any thing is seized under subsection (1) claims the thing within 14 days after the seizure and produces for inspection by the peace officer by whom it was seized, or any other peace officer having custody of it,

(a) a licence under which the person is lawfully entitled to possess it, and

(b) in the case of a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm, an authorization and registration certificate for it, the thing shall without delay be returned to that person.

Remise des objets saisis sur présentation des documents

(2) Ces objets doivent être remis sans délai au saisi, s'il les réclame dans les quatorze jours et présente à l'agent de la paix qui les a saisis ou en a la garde le permis qui l'autorise a en avoir la possession légale, en plus, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, de l'autorisation et du certificat d'enregistrement afférents.

Forfeiture of seized thing

(3) Where any thing seized pursuant to subsection (1) is not claimed and returned as and when provided by subsection (2), a peace officer shall forthwith take the thing before a provincial court judge, who may, after affording the person from whom it was seized or its owner, if known, an opportunity to establish that the person is lawfully entitled to possess it, declare it to be forfeited to

Confiscation

(3) L'agent de la paix remet sans délai les objets saisis non restitués à un juge de la cour provinciale qui peut, après avoir donné au saisi — ou au propriétaire, s'il est connu — l'occasion d'établir son droit de les avoir en sa possession, déclarer qu'ils sont confisqués au profit de Sa

Her Majesty, to be disposed of or otherwise dealt with as the Attorney General directs.

1995, c. 39, s. 139; 2012, c. 6, s. 8; 2015, c. 27, s. 33.

Majesté et qu'il en sera disposé conformément aux instructions du procureur général.

Application for warrant to search and seize

117.04 (1) Where, pursuant to an application made by a peace officer with respect to any person, a justice is satisfied by information on oath that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person possesses a weapon, a prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or an explosive substance in a building, receptacle or place and that it is not desirable in the interests of the safety of the person, or of any other person, for the person to possess the weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, the justice may issue a warrant authorizing a peace officer to search the building, receptacle or place and seize any such thing, and any authorization, licence or registration certificate relating to any such thing, that is held by or in the possession of the person.

117.04 (1) Le juge de paix peut, sur demande de l'agent de la paix, délivrer un mandat autorisant celui-ci à perquisitionner dans tel bâtiment, contenant ou lieu et à saisir les armes, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées ou substances explosives en la possession de telle personne, de même que les autorisations, permis ou certificats d'enregistrement - dont elle est titulaire ou qui sont en sa possession - afférents à ces objets, s'il est convaincu, sur la foi d'une dénonciation sous serment, qu'il existe des motifs raisonnables de croire que cette personne est en possession de tels objets dans ce bâtiment, contenant ou lieu et que cela n'est pas souhaitable pour sa sécurité ou celle d'autrui.

Search and seizure without warrant

(2) Where, with respect to any person, a peace officer is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that it is not desirable, in the interests of the safety of the person or any other person, for the person to possess any weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, the peace officer may, where the grounds for obtaining a warrant under subsection (1) exist but, by reason of a possible danger to the safety of that person or any other person, it would not be practicable to obtain a warrant, search for and seize any such thing, and any authorization, licence or registration certificate relating to any such thing, that is held by or in the possession of the person.

Saisie sans mandat

Return to justice

(3) A peace officer who executes a warrant referred to in subsection (1) or who conducts a search without a warrant under subsection (2) shall forthwith make a return to the justice who issued the warrant or, if no warrant was issued, to a justice who might otherwise have issued a warrant, showing

(a) in the case of an execution of a warrant, the things or documents, if any, seized and the date of execution of the warrant; and

(b) in the case of a search conducted without a warrant, the grounds on which it was concluded that the peace officer was entitled to conduct the search, and the things or documents, if any, seized.

Rapport du mandat au juge de paix

(3) L'agent de la paix présente, immédiatement soit après l'exécution du mandat visé au paragraphe (1), soit après la saisie effectuée sans mandat en vertu du paragraphe (2), au juge de paix qui a délivré le mandat ou qui aurait eu compétence pour le faire un rapport précisant, outre les objets ou les documents saisis, le cas échéant, la date d'exécution du mandat ou les motifs ayant justifié la saisie sans mandat, selon le cas.

Authorizations, etc., revoked

(4) Where a peace officer who seizes any thing under subsection (1) or (2) is unable at the time of the seizure to seize an authorization or a licence under which the person from whom the thing was seized may possess the thing and, in the case of a seized firearm, a registration certificate for the firearm, every authorization, licence and registration certificate held by the person is, as at the time of the seizure, revoked.

Application for disposition

117.05 (1) Where any thing or document has been seized under subsection 117.04(1) or (2), the justice who issued the warrant authorizing the seizure or, if no warrant was issued, a justice who might otherwise have issued a warrant, shall, on application for an order for the disposition of the thing or document so seized made by a peace officer within thirty days after the date of execution of the warrant or of the seizure without a warrant, as the case may be, fix a date for the hearing of the application and direct that notice of the hearing be given to such persons or in such manner as the justice may specify.

Ex parte* hearing

(2) A justice may proceed ex parte to hear and determine an application made under subsection (1) in the absence of the person from whom the thing or document was seized in the same circumstances as those in which a summary conviction court may, under Part XXVII, proceed with a trial in the absence of the defendant.

Hearing of application

(3) At the hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the justice shall hear all relevant evidence, including evidence respecting the value of the thing in respect of which the application was made.

Forfeiture and prohibition order on finding

(4) Where, following the hearing of an application made under subsection (1), the justice finds that it is not desirable in the interests of the safety of the person from whom the thing was seized or of any other person that the person should possess any weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition and explosive substance, or any such thing, the justice shall

(a) order that any thing seized be forfeited to Her Majesty or be otherwise disposed of; and

(b) where the justice is satisfied that the circumstances warrant such an action, order that the possession by that person of any weapon, prohibited device,

Révocation des autorisations, permis et certificats

1995, ch. 39, art. 139; 2004, ch. 12, art. 3.

Demande d'une ordonnance pour disposer des objets saisis

117.05 (1) Lorsque l'agent de la paix sollicite, dans les trente jours suivant la date de l'exécution du mandat ou de la saisie sans mandat, une ordonnance de disposition des objets et des documents saisis en vertu des paragraphes 117.04(1) ou (2), le juge de paix qui l'a délivré, ou celui qui aurait eu compétence pour le faire, peut rendre une telle ordonnance; il fixe la date d'audition de la demande et ordonne que soient avisées les personnes qu'il désigne, de la manière qu'il détermine.

(2) Le juge peut entendre ex parte la demande et la trancher en l'absence de la personne visée par l'ordonnance, dans les cas où les cours des poursuites sommaires peuvent, en vertu de la partie XXVII, tenir le procès en l'absence du défendeur.

Audition de la demande

(3) À l'audition de la demande, il prend connaissance de tous les éléments de preuve pertinents, notamment quant à la valeur des objets saisis.

Conclusion et ordonnance du tribunal

(4) Le juge qui, au terme de l'audition de la demande, conclut qu'il n'est pas souhaitable pour la sécurité du saisi, ni pour celle d'autrui, qu'il ait en sa possession des armes, dispositifs prohibés, munitions, munitions prohibées et substances explosives, ou l'un ou plusieurs de ces objets, doit :

a) ordonner que les objets saisis soient confisqués au profit de Sa Majesté ou qu'il en soit autrement disposé;

b) lorsqu'il est convaincu que les circonstances le justifient, interdire à celui-ci d'avoir en sa possession de ammunition, prohibited ammunition and explosive substance, or of any such thing, be prohibited during any period, not exceeding five years, that is specified in the order, beginning on the making of the order.

tels objets pour une période d'au plus cinq ans à compter de la date de l'ordonnance.

Reasons

(5) Where a justice does not make an order under subsection (4), or where a justice does make such an order but does not prohibit the possession of all of the things referred to in that subsection, the justice shall include in the record a statement of the justice's reasons.

Motifs

Application of ss. 113 to 117

(6) Sections 113 to 117 apply in respect of every order made under subsection (4).

Application des articles 113 à 117

(6) Les articles 113 à 117 s'appliquent à l'ordonnance visée au paragraphe (4).

Appeal by person

(7) Where a justice makes an order under subsection (4) in respect of a person, or in respect of any thing that was seized from a person, the person may appeal to the superior court against the order.

Appel de la personne visée par l'ordonnance

(7) La personne visée par l'ordonnance peut en interjeter appel devant la cour supérieure.

Appeal by Attorney General

(8) Where a justice does not make a finding as described in subsection (4) following the hearing of an application under subsection (1), or makes the finding but does not make an order to the effect described in paragraph (4)(b), the Attorney General may appeal to the superior court against the failure to make the finding or to make an order to the effect so described.

Appel du procureur général

(8) Dans les cas où le juge de paix, après avoir entendu la demande visée au paragraphe (1), ne conclut pas dans le sens indiqué au paragraphe (4) ou, s'il le fait, lorsqu'il ne rend pas l'ordonnance d'interdiction prévue à l'alinéa (4)b), le procureur général peut interjeter appel du défaut devant la cour supérieure.

Application of Part XXVII to appeals

(9) The provisions of Part XXVII, except sections 785 to 812, 816 to 819 and 829 to 838, apply in respect of an appeal made under subsection (7) or (8) with such modifications as the circumstances require and as if each reference in that Part to the appeal court were a reference to the superior court.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Application de la partie XXVII

(9) La partie XXVII, sauf les articles 785 à 812, 816 à 819 et 829 à 838, s'applique, avec les adaptations nécessaires, aux appels interjetés en application des paragraphes (7) ou (8) et la mention de la cour d'appel dans cette partie vaut celle de la cour supérieure.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Where no finding or application

117.06 (1) Any thing or document seized pursuant to subsection 117.04(1) or (2) shall be returned to the person from whom it was seized if

(a) no application is made under subsection 117.05(1) within thirty days after the date of execution of the warrant or of the seizure without a warrant, as the case may be; or

(b) an application is made under subsection 117.05(1) within the period referred to in paragraph (a), and the justice does not make a finding as described in subsection 117.05(4).

Absence de demande ou de conclusion

117.06 (1) Les objets ou documents saisis en vertu des paragraphes 117.04(1) ou (2) doivent être remis au saisi dans les cas suivants :

a) aucune demande n'est présentée en vertu du paragraphe 117.05(1) dans les trente jours qui suivent la date d'exécution du mandat ou de la saisie sans mandat, selon le cas;

b) la demande visée au paragraphe 117.05(1) est présentée dans le délai prévu à l'alinéa a), mais le juge de paix ne conclut pas dans le sens indiqué au paragraphe 117.05(4).

Restoration of authorizations

(2) Where, pursuant to subsection (1), any thing is returned to the person from whom it was seized and an authorization, a licence or a registration certificate, as the case may be, is revoked pursuant to subsection 117.04(4), the justice referred to in paragraph (1)(b) may order that the revocation be reversed and that the authorization, licence or registration certificate be restored.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Exempted Persons

Public officers

117.07 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no public officer is guilty of an offence under this Act or the Firearms Act by reason only that the public officer

(a) possesses a firearm, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device, any prohibited ammunition or an explosive substance in the course of or for the purpose of the public officer's duties or employment;

(b) manufactures or transfers, or offers to manufacture or transfer, a firearm, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device, any ammunition or any prohibited ammunition in the course of the public officer's duties or employment;

(c) exports or imports a firearm, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device or any prohibited ammunition in the course of the public officer's duties or employment;

(d) exports or imports a component or part designed exclusively for use in the manufacture of or assembly into an automatic firearm in the course of the public officer's duties or employment;

(e) in the course of the public officer's duties or employment, alters a firearm so that it is capable of, or manufactures or assembles any firearm with intent to produce a firearm that is capable of, discharging projectiles in rapid succession during one pressure of the trigger;

(f) fails to report the loss, theft or finding of any firearm, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance that occurs in the course of the public officer's duties or employment or the destruction of any such thing in the course of the public officer's duties or employment; or

Rétablissement des autorisations et autres documents

(2) Le juge de paix visé à l'alinéa (1)b) peut renverser la révocation visée au paragraphe 117.04(4) et rétablir la validité d'une autorisation, d'un permis ou d'un certificat d'enregistrement, selon le cas, lorsque, en vertu du paragraphe (1), les objets ont été remis au saisi.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Dispenses

Fonctionnaires publics

117.07 (1) Par dérogation aux autres dispositions de la présente loi, mais sous réserve de l'article 117.1, un fonctionnaire public n'est pas coupable d'une infraction à la présente loi ou à la Loi sur les armes à feu du seul fait que, dans le cadre de ses fonctions, il :

a) a en sa possession une arme à feu, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions prohibées ou des substances explosives;

b) fabrique, cède ou offre de fabriquer ou de céder une arme à feu, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions ou des munitions prohibées;

c) exporte ou importe une arme à feu, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé ou des munitions prohibées;

d) exporte ou importe quelque élément ou pièce conçu exclusivement pour être utilisé dans la fabrication ou l'assemblage d'armes automatiques;

g) modifie le numéro de série d'une arme à feu.

Employees of business with licence

117.09 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no individual who is the holder of a licence to possess and acquire restricted firearms and who is employed by a business as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act that itself is the holder of a licence that authorizes the business to carry out specified activities in relation to prohibited firearms, prohibited weapons, prohibited devices or prohibited ammunition is guilty of an offence under this Act or the Firearms Act by reason only that the individual, in the course of the individual's duties or employment in relation to those specified activities,

(a) possesses a prohibited firearm, a prohibited weapon, a prohibited device or any prohibited ammunition;

(b) manufactures or transfers, or offers to manufacture or transfer, a prohibited weapon, a prohibited device or any prohibited ammunition;

(c) alters a firearm so that it is capable of, or manufactures or assembles any firearm with intent to produce a firearm that is capable of, discharging projectiles in rapid succession during one pressure of the trigger; or

(d) alters a serial number on a firearm.

Employees of business with licence

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no individual who is employed by a business as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act that itself is the holder of a licence is guilty of an offence under this Act or the Firearms Act by reason only that the individual, in the course of the individual's duties or employment, possesses, manufactures or transfers, or offers to manufacture or transfer, a partially manufactured barrelled weapon that, in its unfinished state, is not a barrelled weapon from which any shot, bullet or other projectile can be discharged and that is capable of causing serious bodily injury or death to a person.

Employees of carriers

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no individual who is employed

Employés des titulaires de permis

117.09 (1) Par dérogation aux autres dispositions de la présente loi, mais sous réserve de l'article 117.1, un particulier titulaire d'un permis qui l'autorise à acquérir et à avoir en sa possession une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte et dont l'employeur — une entreprise au sens du paragraphe 2(1) de la Loi sur les armes à feu — est lui-même titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à se livrer à des activités particulières relatives aux armes à feu prohibées, armes prohibées, dispositifs prohibés ou munitions prohibées, n'est pas coupable d'une infraction à la présente loi ou à la Loi sur les armes à feu du seul fait que, dans le cadre de ses fonctions en rapport à ces activités, il :

a) a en sa possession une arme à feu prohibée, une arme prohibée, un dispositif prohibé ou des munitions prohibées;

b) fabrique, cède ou offre de fabriquer ou de céder une arme prohibée, un dispositif prohibé ou des munitions prohibées;

c) modifie ou fabrique une arme à feu de façon à ce qu'elle puisse tirer rapidement plusieurs projectiles à chaque pression de la détente ou assemble des pièces d'armes à feu en vue d'obtenir une telle arme;

d) modifie le numéro de série d'une arme à feu.

Employés d'une entreprise titulaire d'un permis

(2) Par dérogation aux autres dispositions de la présente loi, mais sous réserve de l'article 117.1, un particulier dont l'employeur est une entreprise — au sens du paragraphe 2(1) de la Loi sur les armes à feu — titulaire d'un permis n'est pas coupable d'une infraction à la présente loi ou à cette loi du seul fait que, dans le cadre de ses fonctions, il a en sa possession, fabrique ou cède ou offre de fabriquer ou de céder une arme à feu partiellement fabriquée qui, dans son état incomplet, ne constitue pas une arme pourvue d'un canon permettant de tirer du plomb, des balles ou tout autre projectile et n'est pas susceptible d'infliger des lésions corporelles graves ou la mort à une personne.

by a carrier, as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act, is guilty of an offence under this Act or that Act by reason only that the individual, in the course of the individual's duties or employment, possesses any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, ammunition or prohibited ammunition or transfers, or offers to transfer any such thing.

dont l'employeur est un transporteur au sens du paragraphe 2(1) de la Loi sur les armes à feu n'est pas coupable d'une infraction à la présente loi ou à cette loi du seul fait que, dans le cadre de ses fonctions, il a en sa possession une arme à feu, une arbalète, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions ou des munitions prohibées, ou il cède ou offre de céder de tels objets.

Employees of museums handling functioning imitation antique firearm

(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no individual who is employed by a museum as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act that itself is the holder of a licence is guilty of an offence under this Act or the Firearms Act by reason only that the individual, in the course of the individual's duties or employment, possesses or transfers a firearm that is designed or intended to exactly resemble, or to resemble with near precision, an antique firearm if the individual has been trained to handle and use such a firearm.

Employés de musées — imitation d'armes à feu historiques utilisables

(4) Par dérogation aux autres dispositions de la présente loi, mais sous réserve de l'article 117.1, un particulier dont l'employeur est un musée — au sens du paragraphe 2(1) de la Loi sur les armes à feu — titulaire d'un permis n'est pas coupable d'une infraction à la présente loi ou à la Loi sur les armes à feu du seul fait que, dans le cadre de ses fonctions, il a en sa possession ou cède une arme à feu conçue de façon à avoir l'apparence exacte d'une arme à feu historique — ou à la reproduire le plus fidèlement possible — ou à laquelle on a voulu donner cette apparence, s'il a reçu une formation pour le maniement et l'usage d'une telle arme à feu.

Employees of museums handling firearms generally

(5) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, but subject to section 117.1, no individual who is employed by a museum as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act that itself is the holder of a licence is guilty of an offence under this Act or the Firearms Act by reason only that the individual possesses or transfers a firearm in the course of the individual's duties or employment if the individual is designated, by name, by a provincial minister within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Firearms Act.

Employés de musées — armes à feu

Public safety

(6) A provincial minister shall not designate an individual for the purpose of subsection (5) where it is not desirable, in the interests of the safety of any person, to designate the individual.

Sécurité publique

(6) Le ministre provincial ne procède pas à la désignation d'un particulier visé au paragraphe (5) lorsqu'elle n'est pas souhaitable pour la sécurité de quiconque.

Conditions

(7) A provincial minister may attach to a designation referred to in subsection (5) any reasonable condition that the provincial minister considers desirable in the particular circumstances and in the interests of the safety of any person.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Conditions

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

General

Onus on the accused

117.11 Where, in any proceedings for an offence under any of sections 89, 90, 91, 93, 97, 101, 104 and 105, any question arises as to whether a person is the holder of an authorization, a licence or a registration certificate, the onus is on the accused to prove that the person is the holder of the authorization, licence or registration certificate.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Authorizations, etc., as evidence

117.12 (1) In any proceedings under this Act or any other Act of Parliament, a document purporting to be an authorization, a licence or a registration certificate is evidence of the statements contained therein.

Certified copies

(2) In any proceedings under this Act or any other Act of Parliament, a copy of any authorization, licence or registration certificate is, if certified as a true copy by the Registrar or a chief firearms officer, admissible in evidence and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, has the same probative force as the authorization, licence or registration certificate would have had if it had been proved in the ordinary way.

Certificate of analyst

117.13 (1) A certificate purporting to be signed by an analyst stating that the analyst has analyzed any weapon, prohibited device, ammunition, prohibited ammunition or explosive substance, or any part or component of such a thing, and stating the results of the analysis is evidence in any proceedings in relation to any of those things under this Act or under section 19 of the Export and Import Permits Act in relation to subsection 15(2) of that Act without proof of the signature or official character of the person appearing to have signed the certificate.

Attendance of analyst

(2) The party against whom a certificate of an analyst is produced may, with leave of the court, require the attendance of the analyst for the purposes of cross-examination.

d'un permis délivré en vertu d'une ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe 113(1).

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Dispositions générales

Charge de la preuve

117.11 Dans toute poursuite intentée dans le cadre des articles 89, 90, 91, 93, 97, 101, 104 et 105, c'est au prévenu qu'il incombe éventuellement de prouver qu'une personne est titulaire d'une autorisation, d'un permis ou d'un certificat d'enregistrement.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Authenticité des documents

117.12 (1) Dans toute poursuite intentée en vertu de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale, un document présenté comme étant une autorisation, un permis ou un certificat d'enregistrement fait foi des déclarations qui y sont contenues.

Copies certifiées conformes

(2) Dans toute poursuite intentée dans le cadre de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale, toute copie d'une autorisation, d'un permis ou d'un certificat d'enregistrement certifiée conforme à l'original par le directeur ou le contrôleur des armes à feu est admissible en justice et, sauf preuve contraire, a la même force probante que l'original.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Certificat d'analyse

117.13 (1) Dans toute poursuite intentée en vertu de la présente loi ou de l'article 19 de la Loi sur les licences d'exportation et d'importation en rapport avec le paragraphe 15(2) de cette dernière et relative à une arme, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions, des munitions prohibées ou des substances explosives, ou quelque élément ou pièce de ceux-ci, le certificat d'un analyste où il est déclaré que celui-ci a effectué l'analyse de ces objets et où sont données ses conclusions fait foi de la nature de celle-ci sans qu'il soit nécessaire de prouver la signature ou la qualité officielle du signataire.

Présence requise

(2) La partie contre laquelle le certificat est produit peut, avec l'autorisation du tribunal, exiger que son auteur comparaisse pour qu'elle puisse le contre-interroger.

Notice of intention to produce certificate

(3) No certificate of an analyst may be admitted in evidence unless the party intending to produce it has, before the trial, given to the party against whom it is intended to be produced reasonable notice of that intention together with a copy of the certificate.

(4) and (5) [Repealed, 2008, c. 18, s. 2]

1995, c. 39, s. 139; 2008, c. 18, s. 2.

Avis de production

(3) Le certificat ne peut être admis en preuve que si la partie qui entend le produire a donné un avis raisonnable à la partie contre laquelle il doit servir ainsi qu'une copie de celui-ci.

(4) et (5) [Abrogés, 2008, ch. 18, art. 2]

1995, ch. 39, art. 139; 2008, ch. 18, art. 2.

Amnesty period

117.14 (1) The Governor in Council may, by order, declare for any purpose referred to in subsection (2) any period as an amnesty period with respect to any weapon, prohibited device, prohibited ammunition, explosive substance or component or part designed exclusively for use in the manufacture of or assembly into an automatic firearm.

Purposes of amnesty period

(2) An order made under subsection (1) may declare an amnesty period for the purpose of

(a) permitting any person in possession of any thing to which the order relates to do anything provided in the order, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, delivering the thing to a peace officer, a firearms officer or a chief firearms officer, registering it, destroying it or otherwise disposing of it; or

(b) permitting alterations to be made to any prohibited firearm, prohibited weapon, prohibited device or prohibited ammunition to which the order relates so that it no longer qualifies as a prohibited firearm, a prohibited weapon, a prohibited device or prohibited ammunition, as the case may be.

Reliance on amnesty period

(3) No person who, during an amnesty period declared by an order made under subsection (1) and for a purpose described in the order, does anything provided for in the order, is, by reason only of the fact that the person did that thing, guilty of an offence under this Part.

Proceedings are a nullity

(4) Any proceedings taken under this Part against any person for anything done by the person in reliance of this section are a nullity.

1995, c. 39, s. 139.

Délai d'amnistie

117.14 (1) Le gouverneur en conseil peut, par décret, fixer aux fins visées au paragraphe (2) un délai établissant une amnistie à l'égard d'une arme, d'un dispositif prohibé, de munitions prohibées ou de substances explosives, ou de quelque élément ou pièce conçu exclusivement pour être utilisé dans la fabrication ou l'assemblage d'armes automatiques.

Objet

(2) Le décret peut déclarer une période d'amnistie pour permettre :

a) soit à une personne en possession de tout objet visé par le décret de faire toute chose qui y est mentionnée, notamment le remettre à un agent de la paix, à un préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à feu, l'enregistrer ou en disposer par destruction ou autrement;

b) soit que des modifications soient apportées à ces objets, de façon à ce qu'ils ne soient plus des armes à feu prohibées, des armes prohibées, des dispositifs prohibés ou des munitions prohibées, selon le cas.

Acte non répréhensible

(3) La personne qui, au cours de la période d'amnistie, agit conformément au décret ne peut, de ce seul fait, être coupable d'une infraction à la présente partie.

Nullité des poursuites

(4) Il ne peut, sous peine de nullité, être intenté de poursuite dans le cadre de la présente partie contre une personne ayant agi en conformité avec le présent article.

1995, ch. 39, art. 139.

Regulations

117.15 (1) Subject to subsection (2), the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing anything that by this Part is to be or may be prescribed.

Restriction

(2) In making regulations, the Governor in Council may not prescribe any thing to be a prohibited firearm, a restricted firearm, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device or prohibited ammunition if, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the thing to be prescribed is reasonable for use in Canada for hunting or sporting purposes.

Non-restricted firearm

(3) Despite the definitions prohibited firearm and restricted firearm in subsection 84(1), a firearm that is prescribed to be a non-restricted firearm is deemed not to be a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm.

Restricted firearm

(4) Despite the definition prohibited firearm in subsection 84(1), a firearm that is prescribed to be a restricted firearm is deemed not to be a prohibited firearm.

1995, c. 39, s. 139; 2015, c. 27, s. 34.

Règlements

117.15 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2), le gouverneur en conseil peut, par règlement, prendre toute mesure d'ordre réglementaire prévue ou pouvant être prévue par la présente partie.

Restriction

(2) Le gouverneur en conseil ne peut désigner par règlement comme arme à feu prohibée, arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, arme prohibée, arme à autorisation restreinte, dispositif prohibé ou munitions prohibées toute chose qui, à son avis, peut raisonnablement être utilisée au Canada pour la chasse ou le sport.

Arme à feu sans restriction

(3) Malgré les définitions de arme à feu prohibée et de arme à feu à autorisation restreinte au paragraphe 84(1), une arme à feu désignée par règlement comme étant une arme à feu sans restriction est réputée ne pas être une arme à feu prohibée ni une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte.

Arme à feu à autorisation restreinte

1995, ch. 39, art. 139; 2015, ch. 27, art. 34.

OFFICIAL STATUS OF CONSOLIDATIONS

Subsections 31(1) and (2) of the Legislation Revision and Consolidation Act, in force on June 1, 2009, provide as follows:

Published consolidation is evidence

31 (1) Every copy of a consolidated statute or consolidated regulation published by the Minister under this Act in either print or electronic form is evidence of that statute or regulation and of its contents and every copy purporting to be published by the Minister is deemed to be so published, unless the contrary is shown.

Inconsistencies in Acts

(2) In the event of an inconsistency between a consolidated statute published by the Minister under this Act and the original statute or a subsequent amendment as certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments under the Publication of Statutes Act, the original statute or amendment prevails to the extent of the inconsistency.

CARACTÈRE OFFICIEL DES CODIFICATIONS

Les paragraphes 31(1) et (2) de la Loi sur la révision et la codification des textes législatifs, en vigueur le 1er juin 2009, prévoient ce qui suit :

Codifications comme élément de preuve

31 (1) Tout exemplaire d'une loi codifiée ou d'un règlement codifié, publié par le ministre en vertu de la présente loi sur support papier ou sur support électronique, fait foi de cette loi ou de ce règlement et de son contenu. Tout exemplaire donné comme publié par le ministre est réputé avoir été ainsi publié, sauf preuve contraire.

Incompatibilité — lois

(2) Les dispositions de la loi d'origine avec ses modifications subséquentes par le greffier des Parlements en vertu de la Loi sur la publication des lois l'emportent sur les dispositions incompatibles de la loi codifiée publiée par le ministre en vertu de la présente loi.

LAYOUT

The notes that appeared in the left or right margins are now in boldface text directly above the provisions to which they relate. They form no part of the enactment, but are inserted for convenience of reference only.

MISE EN PAGE

Les notes apparaissant auparavant dans les marges de droite ou de gauche se retrouvent maintenant en caractères gras juste au-dessus de la disposition à laquelle elles se rattachent. Elles ne font pas partie du texte, n'y figurant qu'à titre de repère ou d'information.

NOTE

This consolidation is current to November 2, 2020. The last amendments came into force on June 21, 2019. Any amendments that were not in force as of November 2, 2020 are set out at the end of this document under the heading "Amendments Not in Force".

NOTE

Cette codification est à jour au 2 novembre 2020. Les dernières modifications sont entrées en vigueur le 21 juin 2019. Toutes modifications qui n'étaient pas en vigueur au 2 novembre 2020 sont énoncées à la fin de ce document sous le titre « Modifications non en vigueur ».

Admissibilité

Règles générales

Sécurité publique

5 (1) Le permis ne peut être délivré lorsqu'il est souhaitable, pour sa sécurité ou celle d'autrui, que le demandeur n'ait pas en sa possession une arme à feu, une arbalète, une arme prohibée, une arme à autorisation restreinte, un dispositif prohibé, des munitions ou des munitions prohibées.

Critères d'admissibilité

(2) Pour l'application du paragraphe (1), le contrôleur des armes à feu ou, dans le cas d'un renvoi prévu à l'article 74, le juge de la cour provinciale tient compte, pour les cinq ans précédant la date de la demande, des éléments suivants :

(a) has been convicted or discharged under section 730 of the Criminal Code of

(i) an offence in the commission of which violence against another person was used, threatened or attempted,

(ii) an offence under this Act or Part III of the Criminal Code,

(iii) an offence under section 264 of the Criminal Code (criminal harassment),

(iv) an offence relating to the contravention of subsection 5(1) or (2), 6(1) or (2) or 7(1) of the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, or

(v) an offence relating to the contravention of subsection 9(1) or (2), 10(1) or (2), 11(1) or (2), 12(1), (4), (5), (6) or (7), 13(1) or 14(1) of the Cannabis Act;

(b) has been treated for a mental illness, whether in a hospital, mental institute, psychiatric clinic or otherwise and whether or not the person was confined to such a hospital, institute or clinic, that was associated with violence or threatened or attempted violence on the part of the person against any person; or

(c) has a history of behaviour that includes violence or threatened or attempted violence on the part of the person against any person.

Exception

(3) Despite subsection (2), in determining whether a non-resident who is 18 years old or older and by or on behalf of whom an application is made for a 60-day licence authorizing the non-resident to possess non-restricted firearms is eligible to hold a licence under subsection (1), a chief firearms officer or, on a reference under section 74, a provincial court judge may but need not have regard to the criteria described in subsection (2).

Court orders

6 (1) A person is eligible to hold a licence only if the person is not prohibited by a prohibition order from possessing any firearm, cross-bow, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device or prohibited ammunition.

a) le demandeur a été déclaré coupable ou absous en application de l'article 730 du Code criminel d'une des infractions suivantes :

(i) une infraction commise avec usage, tentative ou menace de violence contre autrui,

(ii) une infraction à la présente loi ou à la partie III du Code criminel,

(iii) une infraction à l'article 264 du Code criminel (harcèlement criminel),

(iv) une infraction relative à la contravention des paragraphes 5(1) ou (2), 6(1) ou (2) ou 7(1) de la Loi réglementant certaines drogues et autres substances,

v) une infraction relative à la contravention au paragraphe 9(1) ou (2), 10(1) ou (2), 11(1) ou (2), 12(1), (4), (5), (6) ou (7), 13(1) ou 14(1) de la Loi sur le cannabis;

b) qu'il ait été interné ou non, il a été traité, notamment dans un hôpital, un institut pour malades mentaux ou une clinique psychiatrique, pour une maladie mentale caractérisée par la menace, la tentative ou l'usage de violence contre lui-même ou autrui;

c) l'historique de son comportement atteste la menace, la tentative ou l'usage de violence contre lui-même ou autrui.

Exception

(3) Malgré le paragraphe (2), pour l'application du paragraphe (1) au non-résident âgé d'au moins dix-huit ans ayant déposé — ou fait déposer — une demande de permis de possession, pour une période de soixante jours, d'une arme à feu sans restriction, le contrôleur des armes à feu ou, dans le cas d'un renvoi prévu à l'article 74, le juge de la cour provinciale peut tenir compte des critères prévus au paragraphe (2), sans toutefois y être obligé.

Ordonnances d'interdiction

6 (1) Le permis ne peut être délivré lorsqu'une ordonnance d'interdiction interdit au demandeur la possession d'une arme à feu, d'une arbalète, d'une arme prohibée, d'une arme à autorisation restreinte, d'un dispositif prohibé ou de munitions prohibées.

Exception

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to any order made under section 113 of the Criminal Code (lifting of prohibition order for sustenance or employment).

Successful completion of safety course

7 (1) An individual is eligible to hold a licence only if the individual

(a) successfully completes the Canadian Firearms Safety Course, as given by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, and passes the tests, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that form part of that Course;

(b) passed, before the commencement day, the tests, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that form part of that Course;

(c) successfully completed, before January 1, 1995, a course that the attorney general of the province in which the course was given had, during the period beginning on January 1, 1993 and ending on December 31, 1994, approved for the purposes of section 106 of the former Act;

(d) passed, before January 1, 1995, a test that the attorney general of the province in which the test was administered had, during the period beginning on January 1, 1993 and ending on December 31, 1994, approved for the purposes of section 106 of the former Act; or

(e) on the commencement day, was an individual referred to in paragraph 7(4)(c) as it read immediately before that day and held a licence.

Restricted firearms safety course

(2) An individual is eligible to hold a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms only if the individual

(a) successfully completes a restricted firearms safety course that is approved by the federal Minister, as given by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, and passes any tests, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that form part of that course;

(b) passed, before the commencement day, a restricted firearms safety test, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that is approved by the federal Minister; or

Exception

(2) Le paragraphe (1) s'applique compte tenu des ordonnances rendues sous le régime de l'article 113 du Code criminel (levée de l'interdiction).

Cours sur la sécurité des armes à feu

7 (1) La délivrance d'un permis à un particulier est subordonnée à l'une des conditions suivantes :

a) la réussite du Cours canadien de sécurité dans le maniement des armes à feu, contrôlé par l'examen y afférent, dont est chargé un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu;

b) la réussite, avant la date de référence, de l'examen de contrôle de ce cours que lui fait passer un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu;

c) avant le 1er janvier 1995, la réussite d'un cours agréé — au cours de la période commençant le 1er janvier 1993 et se terminant le 31 décembre 1994 — par le procureur général de la province où il a eu lieu pour l'application de l'article 106 de la loi antérieure;

d) avant le 1er janvier 1995, la réussite d'un examen agréé — au cours de la période commençant le 1er janvier 1993 et se terminant le 31 décembre 1994 — par le procureur général de la province où il a eu lieu pour l'application de l'article 106 de la loi antérieure;

e) à la date de référence, le particulier était visé à l'alinéa 7(4)c) dans sa version antérieure à cette date et était titulaire d'un permis.

Cours sur la sécurité des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte

(2) La délivrance d'un permis de possession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte à un particulier est subordonnée à l'une des conditions suivantes :

a) la réussite d'un cours sur la sécurité des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, agréé par le ministre fédéral et contrôlé par un examen, dont est chargé un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu;

b) la réussite, avant la date de référence, d'un examen sur la sécurité des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, agréé par le ministre fédéral, que lui fait passer un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu;

(c) on the commencement day, was an individual referred to in paragraph 7(4)(c) as it read immediately before that day and held a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms.

(c) à la date de référence, le particulier était visé à l'alinéa 7(4)c) dans sa version antérieure à cette date et était titulaire d'un permis de possession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte.

After expiration of prohibition order

(3) An individual against whom a prohibition order was made

(a) is eligible to hold a licence only if the individual has, after the expiration of the prohibition order,

(i) successfully completed the Canadian Firearms Safety Course, as given by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, and

(ii) passed the tests, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that form part of that Course; and

(b) is eligible to hold a licence authorizing the individual to possess restricted firearms only if the individual has, after the expiration of the prohibition order,

(i) successfully completed a restricted firearms safety course that is approved by the federal Minister, as given by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, and

(ii) passed any tests, as administered by an instructor who is designated by a chief firearms officer, that form part of that course.

Ordonnances d'interdiction

(3) Le particulier qui est sous le coup d'une ordonnance d'interdiction peut devenir titulaire :

a) d'un permis, s'il réussit, après l'expiration de celle-ci :

(i) le Cours canadien de sécurité dans le maniement des armes à feu donné par un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu,

(ii) les examens de contrôle de ce cours que lui fait passer un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu;

b) d'un permis de possession d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, s'il réussit, après l'expiration de celle-ci :

(i) un cours sur la sécurité des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, agréé par le ministre fédéral, donné par un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu,

(ii) tout examen de contrôle de ce cours que lui fait passer un instructeur désigné par le contrôleur des armes à feu.

Exceptions

(4) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to an individual who

(a) in the prescribed circumstances, has been certified by a chief firearms officer as meeting the prescribed criteria relating to the safe handling and use of firearms and the laws relating to firearms;

(b) is less than eighteen years old and requires a firearm to hunt or trap in order to sustain himself or herself or his or her family;

(c) [Repealed, 2015, c. 27, s. 4]

(d) requires a licence merely to acquire cross-bows; or

(e) is a non-resident who is 18 years old or older and by or on behalf of whom an application is made for a 60-day licence authorizing the non-resident to possess non-restricted firearms.

Exceptions

(4) Les paragraphes (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent pas, selon le cas, au particulier :

a) dont la compétence en matière de législation sur les armes à feu et de règles de sécurité relatives à leur maniement et à leur usage a été certifiée conforme aux exigences réglementaires par le contrôleur des armes à feu dans les cas prévus par règlement;

b) qui, âgé de moins de dix-huit ans, a besoin d'une arme à feu pour chasser, notamment à la trappe, afin de subvenir à ses besoins ou à ceux de sa famille;

c) [Abrogé, 2015, ch. 27, art. 4]

d) qui n'a besoin d'un permis que pour acquérir une arbalète;

e) qui est un non-résident âgé d'au moins dix-huit ans qui a déposé — ou fait déposer — une demande de permis l'autorisant à posséder, pour une période de soixante jours, une arme à feu sans restriction.

Further exception

(5) Subsection (3) does not apply to an individual in respect of whom an order is made under section 113 of the Criminal Code (lifting of prohibition order for sustenance or employment) and who is exempted by a chief firearms officer from the application of that subsection.

1995, c. 39, s. 7; 2003, c. 8, s. 11; 2015, c. 27, s. 4.

Autre exception

(5) Le paragraphe (3) ne s'applique pas au particulier qui est sous le coup d'une ordonnance rendue sous le régime de l'article 113 du Code criminel (levée de l'interdiction) et qui est exempté de l'application de ce paragraphe par le contrôleur des armes à feu.

1995, ch. 39, art. 7; 2003, ch. 8, art. 11; 2015, ch. 27, art. 4.

Safety courses

(2) A business other than a carrier is eligible to hold a licence only if

(a) a chief firearms officer determines that no individual who stands in a prescribed relationship to the business need be eligible to hold a licence under section 7; or

(b) the individuals who stand in a prescribed relationship to the business and who are determined by a chief firearms officer to be the appropriate individuals to satisfy the requirements of section 7 are eligible to hold a licence under that section.

Cours sur la sécurité

(2) Le permis peut être délivré à l'entreprise qui n'est pas un transporteur lorsque le contrôleur des armes à feu décide qu'il n'est pas nécessaire pour les particuliers liés à l'entreprise de manière réglementaire, ou pour ceux de ces particuliers qu'il désigne, de répondre aux exigences prévues à l'article 7.

Employees — firearms

(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), a business other than a carrier is eligible to hold a licence that authorizes the possession of firearms only if every employee of the business who, in the course of duties of employment, handles or would handle firearms is the holder of a licence authorizing the holder to acquire non-restricted firearms.

Employés : armes à feu

(3) Sous réserve du paragraphe (3.1), pour qu'un permis autorisant la possession d'armes à feu soit délivré à une entreprise — qui n'est pas un transporteur —, il faut que chaque employé de celle-ci qui manie ou est susceptible de manier des armes à feu dans le cadre de ses fonctions soit titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir des armes à feu sans restriction.

Employees — prohibited firearms or restricted firearms

(3.1) A business other than a carrier is eligible to hold a licence that authorizes the possession of prohibited firearms or restricted firearms only if every employee of the business who, in the course of duties of employment, handles or would handle firearms is the holder of a licence authorizing the holder to acquire restricted firearms.

Employés : armes à feu prohibées ou armes à feu à autorisation restreinte

(3.1) Pour qu'un permis autorisant la possession d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte soit délivré à une telle entreprise, il faut que chaque employé de celle-ci qui manie ou est susceptible de manier de telles armes dans le cadre de ses fonctions soit titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte.

Employees — prohibited weapons, restricted weapons, etc.

(3.2) A business other than a carrier is eligible to hold a licence that authorizes the possession of prohibited weapons, restricted weapons, prohibited devices or prohibited ammunition only if every employee of the business who, in the course of duties of employment, handles or would handle any of those things is eligible under sections 5 and 6 to hold a licence.

Employés : armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, etc.

(3.2) Pour qu'un permis autorisant la possession d'armes prohibées, d'armes à autorisation restreinte, de dispositifs prohibés ou de munitions prohibées soit délivré à une entreprise — qui n'est pas un transporteur —, il faut que chaque employé de celle-ci qui en manie ou est susceptible d'en manier dans le cadre de ses fonctions réponde aux critères d'admissibilité prévus par les articles 5 et 6.

Exception

(4) In subsection (3), "firearm" does not include a partially manufactured barrelled weapon that, in its unfinished state, is not a barrelled weapon

Exception

(4) Pour l'application du paragraphe (3), « arme à feu » exclut une arme partiellement fabriquée pourvue d'un canon qui, dans son état incomplet, n'est pas une arme pourvue d'un canon susceptible de tirer du plomb, des

(a) from which any shot, bullet or other projectile can be discharged; and

(b) that is capable of causing serious bodily injury or death to a person.

Exception

(5) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of a person who stands in a prescribed relationship to a business where a chief firearms officer determines that, in all the circumstances, the business should not be ineligible to hold a licence merely because of that person's ineligibility.

Exception for museums

(6) Subsection (3) does not apply in respect of an employee of a museum

(a) who, in the course of duties of employment, handles or would handle only firearms that are designed or intended to exactly resemble, or to resemble with near precision, antique firearms, and who has been trained to handle or use such a firearm; or

(b) who is designated, by name, by a provincial minister.

Transporting and using prohibited firearms or restricted firearms

19 (1) An individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms may be authorized to transport a particular prohibited firearm or restricted firearm between two or more specified places for any good and sufficient reason, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing,

(a) for use in target practice, or a target shooting competition, under specified conditions or under the auspices of a shooting club or shooting range that is approved under section 29;

(a.1) to provide instructions in the use of firearms as part of a restricted firearms safety course that is approved by the federal Minister; or

(b) if the individual

(i) changes residence,

Transport et usage d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte

19 (1) Le particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte peut être autorisé à en transporter une en particulier entre des lieux précis pour toute raison valable, notamment :

a) pour le tir à la cible, la participation à une compétition de tir ou l'usage à des conditions précisées ou sous les auspices d'un club de tir ou d'un champ de tir agréé conformément à l'article 29;

a.1) pour offrir un entraînement au maniement des armes à feu dans le cadre d'un cours sur la sécurité des armes à feu à autorisation restreinte agréé par le ministre fédéral;

b) s'il :

(i) change de résidence,

(ii) wishes to transport the firearm to a peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer for registration or disposal in accordance with this Act or Part III of the Criminal Code,

(iii) wishes to transport the firearm for repair, storage, sale, exportation or appraisal, or

(iv) wishes to transport the firearm to a gun show.

(ii) désire la présenter à l'agent de la paix, au préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à feu pour enregistrement ou disposition en conformité avec la présente loi ou la partie III du Code criminel,

(iii) désire la transporter aux fins de réparation, d'entreposage, de vente, d'exportation ou d'évaluation,

(iv) désire l'apporter à une exposition d'armes à feu.

Target practice or competition

(1.1) In the case of an authorization to transport issued for a reason referred to in paragraph (1)(a) within the province where the holder of the authorization resides, the specified places must — except in the case of an authorization that is issued for a prohibited firearm referred to in subsection 12(9) — include all shooting clubs and shooting ranges that are approved under section 29 and that are located in that province.

Tir à la cible ou compétition de tir

Exception for prohibited firearms other than prohibited handguns

(2) Despite subsection (1), an individual must not be authorized to transport a prohibited firearm — other than a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) or a prohibited firearm referred to in subsection 12(9) — between specified places except for the purposes referred to in paragraph (1)(b).

Exception : armes à feu prohibées autres que les armes de poing prohibées

(2) Malgré le paragraphe (1), le particulier ne peut être autorisé à transporter une arme à feu prohibée — autre qu'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) ou une arme à feu prohibée visée au paragraphe 12(9) — entre des lieux précis que pour les raisons visées à l'alinéa (1)b).

Automatic authorization to transport — licence renewal

(2.1) Subject to subsection (2.3), an individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms must, if the licence is renewed, be authorized to transport them within the individual's province of residence

(a) to and from all shooting clubs and shooting ranges that are approved under section 29;

(b) to and from any place a peace officer, firearms officer or chief firearms officer is located, for verification, registration or disposal in accordance with this Act or Part III of the Criminal Code;

(c) to and from a business that holds a licence authorizing it to repair or appraise prohibited firearms or restricted firearms;

(d) to and from a gun show; and

(e) to a port of exit in order to take them outside Canada, and from a port of entry.

Autorisation de transport automatique : renouvellement

(2.1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2.3), le particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte doit, si son permis est renouvelé, être autorisé, dans sa province de résidence, à les transporter :

a) vers tout club de tir et tout champ de tir agréés conformément à l'article 29, et à partir de ceux-ci;

b) vers tout lieu où se trouve un agent de la paix, un préposé aux armes à feu ou un contrôleur des armes à feu pour enregistrement, vérification ou disposition en conformité avec la présente loi ou la partie III du Code criminel, et à partir de celui-ci;

c) vers une entreprise titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à réparer et à évaluer les armes à feu prohibées ou les armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, et à partir de celle-ci;

d) vers une exposition d'armes à feu, et à partir de celle-ci;

e) to a port of exit from which they are to be exported, and from a port of entry.

Automatic authorization to transport — transfer

(2.2) Subject to subsection (2.3), if a chief firearms officer has authorized the transfer of a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm to an individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms, the individual must be authorized

(a) to transport the firearm within the individual's province of residence from the place where the individual acquires it to the place where they may possess it under section 17; and

(b) to transport their prohibited firearms and restricted firearms within the individual's province of residence to and from the places referred to in any of paragraphs (2.1)(a) to (e).

Exceptions

(2.3) An individual must not be authorized under subsection (2.1) or (2.2) to transport the following firearms to or from the places referred to in paragraph (2.1)(a):

(a) a prohibited firearm, other than a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1); and

(b) a restricted firearm or a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) whose transfer was approved, in accordance with subparagraph 28(b)(ii), for the purpose of forming part of a gun collection.

Non-residents

(3) A non-resident may be authorized to transport a particular restricted firearm between specified places in accordance with sections 35 and 35.1.

1995, c. 39, s. 19; 2003, c. 8, s. 16; 2015, c. 27, s. 6; 2019, c. 9, s. 4.

Carrying restricted firearms and pre-February 14, 1995 handguns

20 An individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess restricted firearms or handguns referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns) may be authorized to possess a particular restricted firearm or handgun at a place other than the place at which it is authorized to be possessed if the individual needs the particular restricted firearm or handgun

(a) to protect the life of that individual or of other individuals; or

e) vers un port de sortie afin de les emporter à l'extérieur du Canada, et à partir d'un port d'entrée.

Autorisation de transport automatique : cession

(2.2) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2.3), si un contrôleur des armes à feu autorise la cession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte à un particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, le particulier doit, dans sa province de résidence, être autorisé à transporter :

a) cette arme à feu du lieu de son acquisition au lieu où elle peut être gardée en vertu de l'article 17;

b) toutes ses armes à feu prohibées et ses armes à feu à autorisation restreinte vers les lieux visés aux alinéas (2.1)a) à e), et à partir de ceux-ci.

Exceptions

(2.3) Le particulier ne doit pas être autorisé en vertu des paragraphes (2.1) ou (2.2) à transporter, vers les lieux visés à l'alinéa (2.1)a) ou à partir de ceux-ci, les armes à feu suivantes :

a) une arme à feu prohibée, autre qu'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1);

b) une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) dont la cession a été autorisée, en application du sous-alinéa 28b)(ii), à des fins de collection.

Importation par un non-résident

(3) Un non-résident peut être autorisé à transporter, en conformité avec les dispositions des articles 35 et 35.1, une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte entre des lieux précisés.

1995, ch. 39, art. 19; 2003, ch. 8, art. 16; 2015, ch. 27, art. 6; 2019, ch. 9, art. 4.

Port d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte et d'armes de poing

20 Le particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'armes de poing visées au paragraphe 12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998) peut être autorisé à en posséder une en particulier en un lieu autre que celui où il est permis de la posséder, s'il en a besoin pour protéger sa vie ou celle d'autrui ou pour usage dans le cadre de son activité professionnelle légale.

Authorized Transfers and Lending

General Provisions

Definition of "transfer"

21 For the purposes of sections 22 to 32, transfer means sell, barter or give.

Mental disorder, etc.

22 A person may transfer or lend a firearm to an individual only if the person has no reason to believe that the individual

(a) has a mental illness that makes it desirable, in the interests of the safety of that individual or any other person, that the individual not possess a firearm; or

(b) is impaired by alcohol or a drug.

Authorized Transfers

Authorization to transfer non-restricted firearms

23 A person may transfer a non-restricted firearm if, at the time of the transfer,

(a) the transferee holds a licence authorizing the transferee to acquire and possess that kind of firearm; and

(b) the transferor has no reason to believe that the transferee is not authorized to acquire and possess that kind of firearm.

1995, c. 39, s. 23; 2003, c. 8, s. 17; 2012, c. 6, s. 11; 2015, c. 27, s. 7.

Voluntary request to Registrar

23.1 (1) A transferor referred to in section 23 may request that the Registrar inform the transferor as to whether the transferee, at the time of the transfer, holds and is still eligible to hold the licence referred to in paragraph 23(a), and if such a request is made, the Registrar or his or her delegate, or any other person that the federal Minister may designate, shall so inform the transferor.

No record of request

(2) Despite sections 12 and 13 of the Library and Archives of Canada Act and subsections 6(1) and (3) of the Privacy Act, neither the Registrar or his or her

Cession et prêt

Dispositions générales

Définition de « cession »

21 Pour l'application des articles 22 à 32, cession s'entend de la vente, de l'échange ou du don.

État de santé mentale, alcool et drogue

22 Il ne peut être cédé ou prêté d'arme à feu à un particulier si le cédant ou le prêteur a un motif de croire que soit la possession d'une arme à feu par celui-ci constituerait, vu son état de santé mentale, un danger pour lui-même ou pour autrui, soit les facultés du particulier sont affaiblies par l'alcool ou la drogue.

Cession

Cession d'armes à feu sans restriction

23 La cession d'une arme à feu sans restriction est permise si, au moment où elle s'opère :

a) le cessionnaire est effectivement titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir et à posséder une telle arme à feu;

b) le cédant n'a aucun motif de croire que le cessionnaire n'est pas autorisé à acquérir et à posséder une telle arme à feu.

1995, ch. 39, art. 23; 2003, ch. 8, art. 17; 2012, ch. 6, art. 11; 2015, ch. 27, art. 7.

Demande au directeur

23.1 (1) Le cédant visé à l'article 23 peut demander au directeur qu'il lui indique si, au moment de la cession, le cessionnaire est titulaire du permis mentionné à l'alinéa 23a) et y est toujours admissible; le cas échéant, le directeur, son délégué ou toute autre personne que le ministre fédéral peut désigner lui fournit les renseignements demandés.

Aucun fichier ou registre

(2) Malgré les articles 12 et 13 de la Loi sur la Bibliothèque et les Archives du Canada et les paragraphes 6(1) et (3) de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements delegate nor a designated person shall retain any record of a request made under subsection (1).

personnels, le directeur, son délégué ou la personne désignée, selon le cas, ne conserve aucun registre ou fichier au sujet d'une telle demande.

2012, ch. 6, art. 11.

Authorization to transfer prohibited or restricted firearms

23.2 (1) A person may transfer a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm if, at the time of the transfer,

(a) the transferee holds a licence authorizing the transferee to acquire and possess that kind of firearm;

(b) the transferor has no reason to believe that the transferee is not authorized to acquire and possess that kind of firearm;

(c) the transferor informs the Registrar of the transfer;

(d) if the transferee is an individual, the transferor informs a chief firearms officer of the transfer and obtains the authorization of the chief firearms officer for the transfer;

(e) a new registration certificate for the firearm is issued in accordance with this Act; and

(f) the prescribed conditions are met.

Notice

(2) If, after being informed of a proposed transfer of a firearm, the Registrar decides to refuse to issue a registration certificate for the firearm, the Registrar shall inform a chief firearms officer of that decision.

2012, c. 6, s. 11.

Cession d'armes à feu prohibées ou à autorisation restreinte

23.2 (1) La cession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte est permise si, au moment où elle s'opère :

a) le cessionnaire est effectivement titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir et à posséder une telle arme à feu;

b) le cédant n'a aucun motif de croire que le cessionnaire n'est pas autorisé à acquérir et à posséder une telle arme à feu;

c) le cédant en informe le directeur;

d) le cédant en informe le contrôleur des armes à feu et obtient l'autorisation correspondante, si le cessionnaire est un particulier;

e) un nouveau certificat d'enregistrement de l'arme à feu est délivré conformément à la présente loi;

f) les conditions réglementaires sont remplies.

Notification

(2) Si, après avoir été informé d'un projet de cession d'une arme à feu, il refuse de délivrer un certificat d'enregistrement de l'arme à feu, le directeur notifie sa décision de refus au contrôleur des armes à feu.

2012, ch. 6, art. 11.

Authorization to transfer prohibited weapons, devices and ammunition 24 (1) Subject to section 26, a person may transfer a prohibited weapon, prohibited device or prohibited ammunition only to a business.

Conditions

(2) A person may transfer a prohibited weapon, prohibited device, ammunition or prohibited ammunition to a business only if

(a) the business holds a licence authorizing the business to acquire and possess prohibited weapons, prohibited devices, ammunition or prohibited ammunition, as the case may be; and

Chief firearms officer

27 On being informed of a proposed transfer of a prohibited firearm or restricted firearm under section 23.2, a chief firearms officer shall

(a) verify

(i) whether the transferee or individual holds a licence,

(ii) whether the transferee or individual is still eligible to hold that licence, and

(iii) whether the licence authorizes the transferee or individual to acquire that kind of firearm or to acquire prohibited weapons, prohibited devices,

Contrôleur des armes à feu

27 Dès qu'il est informé d'un projet de cession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte en application de l'article 23.2, le contrôleur des armes à feu :

a) vérifie, à l'égard du cessionnaire ou du particulier :

(i) s'il est titulaire d'un permis,

(ii) s'il y est toujours admissible,

(iii) si le permis autorise l'acquisition de l'objet en cause;

b) en cas de cession d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe ammunition or prohibited ammunition, as the case may be;

(b) in the case of a proposed transfer of a restricted firearm or a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns), verify the purpose for which the transferee or individual wishes to acquire the restricted firearm or handgun and determine whether the particular restricted firearm or handgun is appropriate for that purpose;

(c) decide whether to approve the transfer and inform the Registrar of that decision; and

(d) take the prescribed measures.

1995, c. 39, s. 27; 2003, c. 8, s. 20; 2012, c. 6, s. 13.

12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998), vérifie la finalité de l'acquisition par le cessionnaire ou le particulier et détermine si l'arme est appropriée;

c) autorise ou refuse la cession et avise le directeur de sa décision;

d) prend les mesures réglementaires.

Permitted purposes

28 A chief firearms officer may approve the transfer to an individual of a restricted firearm or a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns) only if the chief firearms officer is satisfied

(a) that the individual needs the restricted firearm or handgun

(i) to protect the life of that individual or of other individuals, or

(ii) for use in connection with his or her lawful profession or occupation; or

(b) that the purpose for which the individual wishes to acquire the restricted firearm or handgun is

(i) for use in target practice, or a target shooting competition, under conditions specified in an authorization to transport or under the auspices of a shooting club or shooting range that is approved under section 29, or

(ii) to form part of a gun collection of the individual, in the case of an individual who satisfies the criteria described in section 30.

1995, c. 39, s. 28; 2003, c. 8, s. 21.

Finalité de l'acquisition

28 Le contrôleur des armes à feu ne peut autoriser la cession à un particulier d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998) que s'il est convaincu que :

a) celui-ci en a besoin pour :

(i) protéger sa vie ou celle d'autrui,

(ii) usage dans le cadre de son activité professionnelle légale;

b) celui-ci désire l'acquérir pour l'une ou l'autre des fins suivantes :

(i) tir à la cible, participation à une compétition de tir ou usage conforme à une autorisation de transport ou sous les auspices d'un club de tir ou d'un champ de tir agréé conformément à l'article 29,

(ii) collection d'armes à feu par le particulier, lorsque les conditions énoncées à l'article 30 sont remplies.

1995, ch. 39, art. 28; 2003, ch. 8, art. 21.

Shooting clubs and shooting ranges

29 (1) No person shall operate a shooting club or shooting range except under an approval of the provincial minister for the province in which the premises of the shooting club or shooting range are located.

Approval

(2) A provincial minister may approve a shooting club or shooting range for the purposes of this Act if

Clubs de tir et champs de tir

29 (1) Nul ne peut, sauf avec l'agrément du ministre provincial, exploiter un club de tir ou un champ de tir situés dans sa province.

Agrément

(2) Le ministre provincial peut conférer l'agrément aux clubs de tir ou aux champs de tir, situés dans sa province, qui se conforment aux règlements d'application de l'alinéa 117e).

Revocation

(3) A provincial minister who approves a shooting club or shooting range for the purposes of this Act may revoke the approval for any good and sufficient reason including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, where the shooting club or shooting range contravenes a regulation made under paragraph 117(e).

Révocation de l'agrément

(3) L'agrément peut être révoqué pour toute raison valable, notamment dans le cas où le club de tir ou le champ de tir contrevient aux règlements d'application de l'alinéa 117e).

Delegation

(4) A chief firearms officer who is authorized in writing by a provincial minister may perform such duties and functions of the provincial minister under this section as are specified in the authorization.

Délégation

(4) Le contrôleur des armes à feu, s'il est le délégué du ministre provincial pour l'application des paragraphes (2) et (3), exerce les attributions précisées dans l'acte de délégation.

Notice of refusal to approve or revocation

(5) Where a provincial minister decides to refuse to approve or to revoke an approval of a shooting club or shooting range for the purposes of this Act, the provincial minister shall give notice of the decision to the shooting club or shooting range.

Notification du refus ou de la révocation de l'agrément

(5) Le ministre provincial est tenu de notifier au club de tir ou au champ de tir intéressé sa décision de refuser ou de révoquer l'agrément nécessaire pour l'application de la présente loi.

Material to accompany notice

(6) A notice given under subsection (5) must include reasons for the decision disclosing the nature of the information relied on for the decision and must be accompanied by a copy of sections 74 to 81.

Contenu

(6) La notification visée au paragraphe (5) comporte les motifs de la décision faisant état de la nature des renseignements sur lesquels il s'est fondé pour la prendre ainsi que le texte des articles 74 à 81.

Non-disclosure of information

(7) A provincial minister need not disclose any information the disclosure of which could, in the opinion of the provincial minister, endanger the safety of any person.

1995, c. 39, s. 29; 2003, c. 8, s. 22(F).

Non-communication des renseignements

(7) Le ministre provincial n'est pas tenu de communiquer des renseignements qui, à son avis, pourraient menacer la sécurité d'une personne.

1995, ch. 39, art. 29; 2003, ch. 8, art. 22(F).

Gun collectors

30 The criteria referred to in subparagraph 28(b)(ii) are that the individual

(a) has knowledge of the historical, technological or scientific characteristics that relate or distinguish the restricted firearms or handguns that he or she possesses;

(b) has consented to the periodic inspection, conducted in a reasonable manner, of the premises in which the restricted firearms or handguns are to be kept; and

Collectionneurs d'armes à feu

30 Pour l'application du sous-alinéa 28b)(ii), les particuliers collectionneurs doivent :

Importation : non-résidents

35 (1) Le non-résident qui n'est pas titulaire d'un permis peut importer une arme à feu non prohibée si, au moment de l'importation :

a) il est âgé d'au moins dix-huit ans;

b) il la déclare à l'agent des douanes selon les modalités réglementaires et, dans le cas d'une déclaration écrite, remplit le formulaire réglementaire et fournit les renseignements réglementaires;

c) il produit, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, l'autorisation de transport y afférente;

d) l'agent des douanes atteste, selon les modalités réglementaires, la déclaration prévue à l'alinéa b) et, le cas échéant, l'autorisation prévue à l'alinéa c).

Non-respect des conditions

(2) Dans le cas où l'arme à feu a été déclarée sans que les conditions des alinéas (1)b) ou c) soient remplies, l'agent des douanes peut en autoriser l'exportation à partir du officer may authorize the firearm to be exported from that customs office or may detain the firearm and give the non-resident a reasonable time to comply with those requirements.

Disposal of firearm

(3) Where those requirements are not complied with within a reasonable time and the firearm is not exported, the firearm shall be disposed of in the prescribed manner.

Non-compliance

(4) If a non-restricted firearm is declared at a customs office to a customs officer and

(a) the non-resident has not truthfully completed the prescribed form, or

(b) the customs officer has reasonable grounds to believe that it is desirable, in the interests of the safety of the non-resident or any other person, that the declaration not be confirmed, the customs officer may refuse to confirm the declaration and may authorize the firearm to be exported from that customs office.

Temporary licence and registration certificate

36 (1) A declaration that is confirmed under paragraph 35(1)(b) has the same effect after the importation of the firearm as a licence authorizing the non-resident to possess only that firearm and, in the case of a restricted firearm, as a registration certificate for the firearm until

(a) the expiry of 60 days after the importation, in the case of a non-restricted firearm; or

(b) the earlier of the expiry of 60 days after the importation and the expiry of the authorization to transport, in the case of a restricted firearm.

Renewal

(2) A chief firearms officer may renew the confirmation of a declaration for one or more periods of sixty days.

Electronic or other means

(3) For greater certainty, an application for a renewal of the confirmation of a declaration may be made by telephone or other electronic means or by mail and a chief bureau de douane de la déclaration, ou la retenir et accorder au non-résident un délai raisonnable pour lui permettre de remplir ces conditions.

Sort de l'arme à feu

(3) Après l'expiration du délai, il est disposé, de la manière réglementaire, de l'arme à feu retenue et non exportée si les conditions ne sont toujours pas remplies.

Non-conformité

(4) Dans le cas où une arme à feu sans restriction a été déclarée au bureau de douane et que le non-résident n'a pas rempli véridiquement le formulaire réglementaire ou que l'agent des douanes a des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'il est souhaitable, pour la sécurité du non-résident ou pour celle d'autrui, que la déclaration ne soit pas attestée, celui-ci peut refuser de l'attester et autoriser l'exportation de l'arme à feu à partir du bureau de douane.

1995, ch. 39, art. 35; 2015, ch. 27, art. 8.

Permis et certificat temporaires

36 (1) Une fois attestée conformément à l'alinéa 35(1)d), la déclaration a valeur de permis de possession — valide à l'égard de l'arme à feu importée seulement — ainsi que, dans le cas d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte, de certificat d'enregistrement, pour :

a) une période de soixante jours à compter de l'importation, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu sans restriction;

b) soit une période de soixante jours à compter de l'importation, soit la période de validité de l'autorisation de transport afférente si elle est inférieure à soixante jours, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte.

Prorogation

(2) Cette période de soixante jours peut être prorogée à une ou plusieurs reprises par le contrôleur des armes à feu.

Moyens électroniques ou autres

(3) Il est entendu que la demande de prorogation peut être faite soit par téléphone ou par tout autre moyen électronique soit par courrier et que le contrôleur des armes à feu peut y faire droit par les mêmes moyens.

Permis, autorisations et certificats d'enregistrement

Demandes

Dépôt d'une demande

54 (1) La délivrance des permis, des autorisations — autre que celles visées aux paragraphes 19(2.1) ou (2.2) — et des certificats d'enregistrement est subordonnée au dépôt d'une demande présentée en la forme réglementaire — écrite ou électronique — ou selon les modalités réglementaires et accompagnée des renseignements réglementaires, et à l'acquittement des droits réglementaires.

To whom made

(2) An application for a licence, registration certificate or authorization must be made to

(a) a chief firearms officer, in the case of a licence, an authorization to carry or an authorization to transport; or

(b) the Registrar, in the case of a registration certificate, an authorization to export or an authorization to import.

Pre-commencement restricted firearms and handguns

(3) An individual who, on the commencement day, possesses one or more restricted firearms or one or more handguns referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns) must specify, in any application for a licence authorizing the individual to possess restricted firearms or handguns that are so referred to,

(a) except in the case of a firearm described in paragraph (b), for which purpose described in section 28 the individual wishes to continue to possess restricted firearms or handguns that are so referred to; and

(b) for which of those firearms was a registration certificate under the former Act issued because they were relics, were of value as a curiosity or rarity or were valued as a memento, remembrance or souvenir.

1995, c. 39, s. 54; 2003, c. 8, ss. 36, 56; 2015, c. 27, s. 11.

Further information

55 (1) A chief firearms officer or the Registrar may require an applicant for a licence or authorization to submit such information, in addition to that included in the application, as may reasonably be regarded as relevant for the purpose of determining whether the applicant is eligible to hold the licence or authorization.

Investigation

(2) Without restricting the scope of the inquiries that may be made with respect to an application for a licence, a chief firearms officer may conduct an investigation of the applicant, which may consist of interviews with neighbours, community workers, social workers, individuals who work or live with the applicant, spouse or common-law partner, former spouse or former common-law partner, dependants or whomever in the opinion of the chief firearms officer may provide information pertaining to whether the applicant is eligible under section 5 to hold a licence.

1995, c. 39, s. 55; 2000, c. 12, s. 118.

Destinataire de la demande

(2) La demande est adressée :

a) au contrôleur des armes à feu, dans le cas des permis et des autorisations de port et de transport;

b) au directeur, dans le cas des certificats d'enregistrement et des autorisations d'exportation ou d'importation.

Armes à feu à autorisation restreinte et armes de poing antérieures

(3) Le particulier qui possède une ou plusieurs armes à feu à autorisation restreinte ou armes de poing visées au paragraphe 12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998) à la date de référence est tenu de préciser dans toute demande de permis correspondante :

a) sauf s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu visée à l'alinéa b), pour laquelle des fins, prévues à l'article 28, il désire continuer cette possession;

b) pour lesquelles de ces armes à feu a été délivré le certificat d'enregistrement prévu par la loi antérieure parce qu'elles sont des antiquités ou avaient une valeur de curiosité, de rareté, de commémoration ou de simple souvenir.

1995, ch. 39, art. 54; 2003, ch. 8, art. 36 et 56; 2015, ch. 27, art. 11.

Renseignements supplémentaires

55 (1) Le contrôleur des armes à feu ou le directeur peut exiger du demandeur d'un permis ou d'une autorisation tout renseignement supplémentaire normalement utile pour lui permettre de déterminer si celui-ci répond aux critères d'admissibilité au permis ou à l'autorisation.

Enquête

(2) Sans que le présent paragraphe ait pour effet de restreindre le champ des vérifications pouvant être menées sur une demande de permis, le contrôleur des armes à feu peut procéder à une enquête pour déterminer si le demandeur peut être titulaire du permis prévu à l'article 5 et, à cette fin, interroger des voisins de celui-ci, des travailleurs communautaires, des travailleurs sociaux, toute personne qui travaille ou habite avec lui, son époux ou conjoint de fait ou son ex-époux ou ancien conjoint de fait, des membres de sa famille ou toute personne qu'il juge susceptible de lui communiquer des renseignements pertinents.

1995, ch. 39, art. 55; 2000, ch. 12, art. 118.

Licences

56 (1) A chief firearms officer is responsible for issuing licences.

Only one licence per individual

(2) Only one licence may be issued to any one individual.

Separate licence for each location

(3) A business other than a carrier requires a separate licence for each place where the business is carried on.

Authorizations to carry or transport

57 A chief firearms officer is responsible for issuing authorizations to carry and authorizations to transport.

Conditions

58 (1) A chief firearms officer who issues a licence, an authorization to carry or an authorization to transport may attach any reasonable condition to it that the chief firearms officer considers desirable in the particular circumstances and in the interests of the safety of the holder or any other person.

Exception — licence or authorization

(1.1) However, a chief firearms officer's power to attach a condition to a licence, an authorization to carry or an authorization to transport is subject to the regulations.

Minors

(2) Before attaching a condition to a licence that is to be issued to an individual who is less than eighteen years old and who is not eligible to hold a licence under subsection 8(2) (minors hunting as a way of life), a chief firearms officer must consult with a parent or person who has custody of the individual.

Minors

(3) Before issuing a licence to an individual who is less than eighteen years old and who is not eligible to hold a licence under subsection 8(2) (minors hunting as a way of life), a chief firearms officer shall have a parent or person who has custody of the individual sign the licence, including any conditions attached to it.

(3) Un permis est délivré pour chaque établissement où l'entreprise — qui n'est pas un transporteur — exerce ses activités.

Autorisations de port et de transport

57 Les autorisations de port et de transport sont délivrées par le contrôleur des armes à feu.

Conditions : permis et autorisations

58 (1) Le contrôleur des armes à feu peut assortir les permis et les autorisations de port et de transport des conditions qu'il estime souhaitables dans les circonstances et en vue de la sécurité de leur titulaire ou d'autrui.

Exception : permis ou autorisation

Mineurs : consultation

(2) Dans le cas d'un particulier âgé de moins de dix-huit ans qui n'est pas admissible au permis prévu au paragraphe 8(2) (chasse de subsistance par les mineurs), le contrôleur des armes à feu consulte le père ou la mère du particulier ou la personne qui en a la garde avant d'assortir le permis d'une condition.

Mineurs : information des parents ou gardiens

(3) Avant de délivrer un permis au particulier visé au paragraphe (2), le contrôleur des armes à feu veille à ce que le père ou la mère ou la personne qui en a la garde ait connaissance des conditions dont est assorti le permis en exigeant leur signature sur celui-ci.

1995, c. 39, s. 63; 2003, c. 8, s. 39.

Term

Term of licences

64 (1) A licence that is issued to an individual who is eighteen years old or older expires on the earlier of

(a) five years after the birthday of the holder next following the day on which it is issued, and

(b) the expiration of the period for which it is expressed to be issued.

Extension period

(1.1) Despite subsection (1), if a licence for firearms is not renewed before it expires, the licence is extended for a period of six months beginning on the day on which it would have expired under that subsection.

No use or acquisition

(1.2) The holder of a licence that is extended under subsection (1.1) must not, until the renewal of their licence, use their firearms or acquire any firearms or ammunition.

Authorizations — no extension

(1.3) The extension of a licence under subsection (1.1) does not result in the extension of any authorization to carry or authorization to transport beyond the day on which the licence would have expired under subsection (1).

Authorizations — issuance

(1.4) During the extension period, the following authorizations must not be issued to the holder of the licence:

(a) an authorization to carry; and

(b) an authorization to transport, unless it is issued

(i) for a reason referred to in subparagraph 19(1)(b)(i) or (ii), or

Portée territoriale

63 (1) Les permis, les certificats d'enregistrement et les autorisations de transport, d'exportation ou d'importation sont valides partout au Canada.

(2) [Abrogé, 2003, ch. 8, art. 39]

Exceptions : autorisation de port

(3) Les autorisations de port ne sont pas valides à l'extérieur de la province de délivrance.

1995, ch. 39, art. 63; 2003, ch. 8, art. 39.

Durée de validité

Permis

64 (1) Les permis délivrés aux particuliers âgés d'au moins dix-huit ans sont valides pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser cinq ans après le premier anniversaire de naissance du titulaire suivant la date de délivrance.

Prolongation de la période de validité

(1.1) Malgré le paragraphe (1), la période de validité d'un permis relatif à une arme à feu est prolongée de six mois dans le cas où il n'a pas été renouvelé avant sa date d'expiration.

Interdiction d'utilisation ou d'acquisition

(1.2) Le titulaire du permis dont la validité est prolongée au titre du paragraphe (1.1) ne peut, avant le renouvellement du permis, utiliser ses armes à feu ou acquérir des armes à feu ou des munitions.

Autorisations : aucune prolongation

Autorisations : délivrance

(1.4) Pendant la période de prolongation, les autorisations ci-après ne peuvent être délivrées au titulaire du permis :

a) une autorisation de port;

b) une autorisation de transport, sauf si elle est délivrée pour l'une des raisons suivantes :

(ii) because the holder wishes to transport a firearm for disposal through sale or exportation.

(i) une raison mentionnée aux sous-alinéas 19(1)b)(i) ou (ii),

(ii) le titulaire désire transporter une arme à feu afin d'en disposer en la vendant ou en l'exportant.

Minors

(2) A licence that is issued to an individual who is less than eighteen years old expires on the earlier of

(a) the day on which the holder attains the age of eighteen years, and

(b) the expiration of the period for which it is expressed to be issued.

Mineurs

(2) Les permis délivrés aux particuliers âgés de moins de dix-huit ans sont valides pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser la date où le titulaire atteint l'âge de dix-huit ans.

Businesses

(3) A licence that is issued to a business other than a business referred to in subsection (4) expires on the earlier of

(a) three years after the day on which it is issued, and

(b) the expiration of the period for which it is expressed to be issued.

Entreprises

(3) Les permis délivrés aux entreprises — autres que celles visées au paragraphe (4) — sont valides pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser trois ans.

Businesses that sell only ammunition

(4) A licence that is issued to a business that sells ammunition but is not authorized to possess firearms, prohibited weapons, restricted weapons, prohibited devices or prohibited ammunition expires on the earlier of

(a) five years after the day on which it is issued, and

(b) the expiration of the period for which it is expressed to be issued.

Entreprises qui ne vendent que des munitions

(4) Les permis délivrés aux entreprises qui vendent des munitions, mais qui ne sont pas autorisées à posséder des armes à feu, des armes prohibées, des armes à autorisation restreinte, des dispositifs prohibés ou des munitions prohibées sont valides pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser cinq ans suivant la date de délivrance.

Notification

(7) Le cas échéant, le contrôleur des armes à feu notifie la prolongation aux titulaires des permis.

1995, ch. 39, art. 64; 2003, ch. 8, art. 40; 2008, ch. 20, art. 3; 2015, ch. 27, art. 14.

Term of authorizations

65 (1) Subject to subsections (2) to (4), an authorization expires on the expiration of the period for which it is expressed to be issued.

Autorisations

65 (1) Sous réserve des paragraphes (2) à (4), les autorisations sont valides pour la période mentionnée.

Authorizations to transport

(2) Subject to subsection (3), an authorization to transport that takes the form of a condition attached to a licence expires on the earlier of

Autorisations de transport : permis

(2) Sous réserve du paragraphe (3), l'autorisation de transport exprimée sous forme de condition d'un permis est valide pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser la date d'expiration du permis.

(a) the expiration of the period for which the condition is expressed to be attached, and

(b) the expiration of the licence.

Authorizations to transport

(3) An authorization to transport a prohibited firearm, except for an automatic firearm, or a restricted firearm for use in target practice, or a target shooting competition, under specified conditions or under the auspices of a shooting club or shooting range that is approved under section 29, whether or not the authorization takes the form of a condition attached to the licence of the holder of the authorization, expires on the earlier of

(a) the expiration of the period for which the authorization is expressed to be issued, which period may be no more than five years, and

(b) the expiration of the licence.

Authorizations to carry

(4) An authorization to carry expires

(a) in the case of an authorization to carry that takes the form of a condition attached to a licence, on the earlier of

(i) the expiration of the period for which the condition is expressed to be attached, which period may not be more than two years, and

(ii) the expiration of the licence; and

(b) in the case of an authorization to carry that does not take the form of a condition attached to a licence, on the expiration of the period for which the authorization is expressed to be issued, which period may not be more than two years.

1995, c. 39, s. 65; 2003, c. 8, s. 41.

Term of registration certificates

66 A registration certificate for a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm expires when

(a) the holder of the registration certificate ceases to be the owner of the firearm; or

(b) the firearm ceases to be a firearm.

1995, c. 39, s. 66; 2012, c. 6, s. 20.

Renewal

67 (1) A chief firearms officer may renew a licence, authorization to carry or authorization to transport in the prescribed manner.

Autorisations de transport

(3) L'autorisation de transport d'une arme à feu prohibée — à l'exception d'une arme automatique — ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte pour le tir à la cible, la participation à une compétition de tir ou un usage conforme à des conditions précisées ou sous les auspices d'un club de tir ou d'un champ de tir agréé conformément à l'article 29 est valide, qu'elle soit ou non exprimée sous forme de condition du permis de son titulaire, pour la période mentionnée — d'au plus cinq ans — , qui ne peut dépasser la date d'expiration du permis.

Autorisations de port

(4) L'autorisation de port :

a) exprimée sous forme de condition d'un permis est valide pour la période mentionnée — d'au plus deux ans — , qui ne peut dépasser la date d'expiration du permis;

b) non exprimée sous forme de condition d'un permis est valide pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser deux ans.

1995, ch. 39, art. 65; 2003, ch. 8, art. 41.

Certificat d'enregistrement

66 Le certificat d'enregistrement est valide tant que son titulaire demeure propriétaire de l'arme à feu à laquelle il se rapporte ou que celle-ci demeure une arme à feu.

1995, ch. 39, art. 66; 2012, ch. 6, art. 20.

Prorogation

67 (1) Le contrôleur des armes à feu peut renouveler les permis et les autorisations de port et de transport selon les modalités réglementaires.

Restricted firearms and pre-December 1, 1998 handguns

(2) On renewing a licence authorizing an individual to possess restricted firearms or handguns referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns), a chief firearms officer shall decide whether any of those firearms or handguns that the individual possesses are being used for a purpose described in section 28.

Armes de poing et armes à feu à autorisation restreinte

(2) En cas de renouvellement du permis de possession par un particulier d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998), il détermine si celle-ci est utilisée aux fins prévues à l'article 28.

Registrar

(3) A chief firearms officer who decides that any restricted firearms or any handguns referred to in subsection 12(6.1) (pre-December 1, 1998 handguns) that are possessed by an individual are not being used for that purpose shall

(a) give notice of that decision in the prescribed form to the individual; and

(b) inform the Registrar of that decision.

Notification au directeur

(3) S'il détermine qu'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) (armes de poing : 1er décembre 1998) en la possession d'un particulier n'est pas utilisée aux fins indiquées, il notifie sa décision à celui-ci en la forme réglementaire et en informe le directeur.

Relics

(4) Subsections (2) and (3) do not apply to a firearm

(a) that is a relic, is of value as a curiosity or rarity or is valued as a memento, remembrance or souvenir;

(b) that was specified in the licence application as being a firearm for which a registration certificate under the former Act was issued because the firearm was a relic, was of value as a curiosity or rarity or was valued as a memento, remembrance or souvenir;

(c) for which a registration certificate under the former Act was issued because the firearm was a relic, was of value as a curiosity or rarity or was valued as a memento, remembrance or souvenir; and

(d) in respect of which an individual, on the commencement day, held a registration certificate under the former Act.

Antiquités

(4) Les paragraphes (2) et (3) ne s'appliquent pas à une arme à feu :

a) ayant une valeur de curiosité, de rareté, de commémoration ou de simple souvenir;

b) pour laquelle il est précisé dans la demande de permis que le certificat d'enregistrement prévu par la loi antérieure a été délivré parce qu'elle avait une telle valeur;

c) pour laquelle a été délivré le certificat d'enregistrement prévu par la loi antérieure parce qu'elle avait une telle valeur;

d) pour laquelle un particulier était titulaire, à la date de référence, d'un certificat d'enregistrement délivré en application de la loi antérieure.

Material to accompany notice

(5) A notice given under paragraph (3)(a) must include the reasons for the decision and be accompanied by a copy of sections 74 to 81.

1995, c. 39, s. 67; 2003, c. 8, ss. 42, 56.

Contenu de la notification

(5) La notification prévue au paragraphe (3) comporte les motifs de la décision ainsi que le texte des articles 74 à 81.

1995, ch. 39, art. 67; 2003, ch. 8, art. 42 et 56.

Refusal to Issue and Revocation

Licences and authorizations

68 A chief firearms officer shall refuse to issue a licence if the applicant is not eligible to hold one and may refuse to issue an authorization to carry or authorization to transport for any good and sufficient reason.

Registration certificates

69 The Registrar may refuse to issue a registration certificate, authorization to export or authorization to import for any good and sufficient reason including, in the case of an application for a registration certificate, where the applicant is not eligible to hold a registration certificate.

Revocation of licence or authorization

70 (1) A chief firearms officer may revoke a licence, an authorization to carry or an authorization to transport for any good and sufficient reason including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,

(a) where the holder of the licence or authorization

(i) is no longer or never was eligible to hold the licence or authorization,

(ii) contravenes any condition attached to the licence or authorization, or

(iii) has been convicted or discharged under section 730 of the Criminal Code of an offence referred to in paragraph 5(2)(a); or

(b) where, in the case of a business, a person who stands in a prescribed relationship to the business has been convicted or discharged under section 730 of the Criminal Code of any such offence.

(2) The Registrar may revoke an authorization to export or authorization to import for any good and sufficient reason.

1995, c. 39, ss. 70, 137; 2003, c. 8, s. 43(E).

Revocation of registration certificate

71 (1) The Registrar

(a) may revoke a registration certificate for a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm for any good and sufficient reason; and

(b) shall revoke a registration certificate for a firearm held by an individual where the Registrar is informed

Non-délivrance et révocation

Non-délivrance : contrôleur des armes à feu

68 Le contrôleur des armes à feu ne délivre pas de permis au demandeur qui ne répond pas aux critères d'admissibilité et peut refuser la délivrance des autorisations de port ou de transport pour toute raison valable.

Non-délivrance : directeur

69 Le directeur peut refuser la délivrance du certificat d'enregistrement et des autorisations d'exportation ou d'importation pour toute raison valable, notamment, dans le cas du certificat d'enregistrement, lorsque le demandeur n'y est pas admissible.

Révocation : permis et autorisations

70 (1) Le contrôleur des armes à feu peut révoquer un permis ou une autorisation de port ou de transport pour toute raison valable, notamment parce que :

a) le titulaire soit ne peut plus ou n'a jamais pu être titulaire du permis ou de l'autorisation, soit enfreint une condition du permis ou de l'autorisation, soit encore a été déclaré coupable ou absous en application de l'article 730 du Code criminel d'une infraction visée à l'alinéa 5(2)a);

b) dans le cas d'une entreprise, une personne liée de manière réglementaire à celle-ci a été déclarée coupable ou absoute en application de l'article 730 du Code criminel d'une telle infraction.

Directeur

(2) Le directeur peut révoquer les autorisations d'exportation ou d'importation pour toute raison valable.

1995, ch. 39, art. 70 et 137; 2003, ch. 8, art. 43(A).

Révocation : certificats d'enregistrement

71 (1) Le directeur peut révoquer le certificat d'enregistrement d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte pour toute raison valable; il est tenu de le faire pour toute arme à feu en la possession d'un particulier dans le cas où le contrôleur des armes à feu l'informe, en application de l'article 67, que celle-ci n'est pas utilisée aux fins prévues à l'article 28.

by a chief firearms officer under section 67 that the firearm is not being used for a purpose described in section 28.

Automatic revocation of registration certificate

(2) A registration certificate for a prohibited firearm referred to in subsection 12(3) (pre-August 1, 1992 converted automatic firearms) is automatically revoked on the change of any alteration in the prohibited firearm that was described in the application for the registration certificate.

1995, c. 39, s. 71; 2003, c. 8, s. 44; 2012, c. 6, s. 21.

Notice of refusal to issue or revocation

72 (1) Subject to subsection (1.1), if a chief firearms officer decides to refuse to issue or to revoke a licence or authorization to transport or the Registrar decides to refuse to issue or to revoke a registration certificate, authorization to export or authorization to import, the chief firearms officer or Registrar shall give notice of the decision in the prescribed form to the applicant for or holder of the licence, registration certificate or authorization.

When notice not required

(1.1) Notice under subsection (1) need not be given in any of the following circumstances:

(a) if the holder has requested that the licence, registration certificate or authorization be revoked; or

(b) if the revocation is incidental to the issuance of a new licence, registration certificate or authorization.

Material to accompany notice

(2) A notice given under subsection (1) must include reasons for the decision disclosing the nature of the information relied on for the decision and must be accompanied by a copy of sections 74 to 81.

Non-disclosure of information

(3) A chief firearms officer or the Registrar need not disclose any information the disclosure of which could, in the opinion of the chief firearms officer or the Registrar, endanger the safety of any person.

Disposal of firearms

(4) A notice given under subsection (1) in respect of a licence must specify a reasonable period during which the applicant for or holder of the licence may deliver to a peace officer or a firearms officer or a chief firearms officer or otherwise lawfully dispose of any firearm, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device or prohibited ammunition that the applicant for or holder of

Révocation automatique du certificat d'enregistrement

(2) Tout changement aux modifications décrites sur la demande de certificat d'enregistrement d'une arme à feu prohibée visée au paragraphe 12(3) (armes automatiques modifiées : 1er août 1992) entraîne la révocation de plein droit du certificat.

1995, ch. 39, art. 71; 2003, ch. 8, art. 44; 2012, ch. 6, art. 21.

Notification de la non-délivrance ou de la révocation

72 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (1.1), le contrôleur des armes à feu, dans le cas d'un permis ou d'une autorisation de transport, ou le directeur, dans le cas d'un certificat d'enregistrement ou d'une autorisation d'exportation ou d'importation, notifie à l'intéressé, en la forme réglementaire, sa décision de refus ou de révocation.

Cas d'exception

(1.1) La notification n'est pas requise dans les cas suivants :

a) le titulaire a demandé la révocation;

b) la révocation est liée à la délivrance d'un autre permis ou certificat ou d'une autre autorisation.

Contenu

(2) La notification comporte les motifs de la décision faisant état de la nature des renseignements sur lesquels elle est fondée ainsi que le texte des articles 74 à 81.

Non-communication des renseignements

(3) Le contrôleur des armes à feu ou le directeur n'est pas tenu de communiquer des renseignements qui, à son avis, pourraient menacer la sécurité d'une personne.

Disposition des armes à feu — permis

(4) La notification accorde un délai raisonnable pendant lequel le demandeur ou le titulaire du permis peut se départir légalement des armes à feu, armes prohibées, dispositifs prohibés ou munitions prohibées en sa possession, notamment en les remettant à un agent de la paix, au préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à the licence possesses and during which sections 91, 92 and 94 of the Criminal Code do not apply to the applicant or holder.

Disposal of firearms — registration certificate

(5) A notice given under subsection (1) in respect of a registration certificate for a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm must specify a reasonable period during which the applicant for or holder of the registration certificate may deliver to a peace officer or a firearms officer or a chief firearms officer or otherwise lawfully dispose of the firearm to which the registration certificate relates and during which sections 91, 92 and 94 of the Criminal Code do not apply to the applicant or holder.

Reference

(6) If the applicant for or holder of the licence or registration certificate refers the refusal to issue it or revocation of it to a provincial court judge under section 74, the reasonable period of time does not begin until after the reference is finally disposed of.

1995, c. 39, s. 72; 2003, c. 8, s. 45; 2012, c. 6, s. 22.

73 [Repealed, 2003, c. 8, s. 46]

References to Provincial Court Judge

Reference to judge of refusal to issue or revocation, etc.

74 (1) Subject to subsection (2), where

(a) a chief firearms officer or the Registrar refuses to issue or revokes a licence, registration certificate, authorization to transport, authorization to export or authorization to import,

(b) a chief firearms officer decides under section 67 that a firearm possessed by an individual who holds a licence is not being used for a purpose described in section 28, or

(c) a provincial minister refuses to approve or revokes the approval of a shooting club or shooting range for the purposes of this Act, the applicant for or holder of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval may refer the matter to a provincial court judge in the territorial division in which the applicant or holder resides.

Limitation period

(2) An applicant or holder may only refer a matter to a provincial court judge under subsection (1) within thirty days after receiving notice of the decision of the chief feu, sans qu'une poursuite puisse être intentée contre lui en vertu des articles 91, 92 ou 94 du Code criminel.

Disposition des armes à feu — certificat d'enregistrement

(5) La notification accorde un délai raisonnable pendant lequel le demandeur ou le titulaire d'un certificat d'enregistrement d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte peut se départir légalement de celle-ci, notamment en la remettant à un agent de la paix, au préposé aux armes à feu ou au contrôleur des armes à feu, aucune poursuite ne pouvant être intentée contre lui en vertu des articles 91, 92 ou 94 du Code criminel pendant ce délai.

Renvoi

(6) Lorsque le demandeur ou le titulaire du permis ou du certificat d'enregistrement soumet la non-délivrance ou la révocation du document en cause à un juge de la cour provinciale en vertu de l'article 74, le délai ne commence à courir qu'après la décision finale du juge.

1995, ch. 39, art. 72; 2003, ch. 8, art. 45; 2012, ch. 6, art. 22.

73 [Abrogé, 2003, ch. 8, art. 46]

Renvoi à un juge de la cour provinciale

Renvoi

74 (1) Le demandeur ou le titulaire d'un permis, d'un certificat d'enregistrement, d'une autorisation de transport, d'exportation ou d'importation ou d'un agrément peut soumettre à un juge de la cour provinciale de la circonscription territoriale de sa résidence les cas suivants :

a) la non-délivrance ou révocation, par le contrôleur des armes à feu ou le directeur, du document en cause;

b) la décision du contrôleur des armes à feu, prise aux termes de l'article 67, selon laquelle l'arme à feu d'un particulier n'est pas utilisée aux fins prévues à l'article 28;

c) le refus ou la révocation de l'agrément d'un club de tir ou de champs de tir par le ministre provincial.

Délai

(2) La saisine est à effectuer par le requérant dans les trente jours suivant la réception de la notification de la décision faite par le contrôleur des armes à feu, le firearms officer, Registrar or provincial minister under section 29, 67 or 72 or within such further time as is allowed by a provincial court judge, whether before or after the expiration of those thirty days.

directeur ou le ministre provincial en vertu des articles 29, 67 ou 72 ou dans le délai supplémentaire que le juge peut lui accorder avant ou après l'expiration des trente jours.

1995, ch. 39, art. 74; 2003, ch. 8, art. 47.

Hearing of reference

75 (1) On receipt of a reference under section 74, the provincial court judge shall fix a date for the hearing of the reference and direct that notice of the hearing be given to the chief firearms officer, Registrar or provincial minister and to the applicant for or holder of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval, in such manner as the provincial court judge may specify.

Audition et notification

75 (1) Le juge de la cour provinciale fixe la date d'audition du cas et ordonne que notification en soit faite, de la manière qu'il précise, au requérant ainsi qu'au contrôleur des armes à feu, au directeur ou au ministre provincial.

Evidence

(2) At the hearing of the reference, the provincial court judge shall hear all relevant evidence presented by or on behalf of the chief firearms officer, Registrar or provincial minister and the applicant or holder.

Éléments de preuve

(2) Lors de l'audition, il est saisi des éléments de preuve pertinents déposés par le contrôleur des armes à feu, le directeur ou le ministre provincial ou par le requérant, ou pour leur compte.

Burden of proof

(3) At the hearing of the reference, the burden of proof is on the applicant or holder to satisfy the provincial court judge that the refusal to issue or revocation of the licence, registration certificate or authorization, the decision or the refusal to approve or revocation of the approval was not justified.

Charge de la preuve

(3) Il appartient au requérant de convaincre le juge que la non-délivrance, la révocation, le refus ou la décision n'était pas justifié.

Where hearing may proceed ex parte

(4) A provincial court judge may proceed ex parte to hear and determine a reference in the absence of the applicant or holder in the same circumstances as those in which a summary conviction court may, under Part XXVII of the Criminal Code, proceed with a trial in the absence of the defendant.

Audition ex parte

(4) Le juge peut entendre ex parte le cas et le trancher en l'absence du requérant dans les cas où les cours de poursuites sommaires peuvent, en vertu de la partie XXVII du Code criminel, tenir le procès en l'absence du défendeur.

Decision by provincial court judge

76 On the hearing of a reference, the provincial court judge may, by order,

(a) confirm the decision of the chief firearms officer, Registrar or provincial minister;

(b) direct the chief firearms officer or Registrar to issue a licence, registration certificate or authorization or direct the provincial minister to approve a shooting club or shooting range; or

(c) cancel the revocation of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval or the decision of the chief firearms officer under section 67.

Décision

76 Au terme de l'audition du cas, le juge peut, par ordonnance :

a) confirmer la décision du contrôleur des armes à feu, du directeur ou du ministre provincial;

b) enjoindre au contrôleur des armes à feu ou au directeur de délivrer le permis, le certificat d'enregistrement ou l'autorisation ou enjoindre au ministre provincial de conférer l'agrément au club de tir ou au champ de tir;

c) annuler la révocation du permis, du certificat d'enregistrement, de l'autorisation, de l'agrément ou la décision du contrôleur des armes à feu prise aux termes de l'article 67.

Appeals to Superior Court and Court of Appeal

Nunavut

76.1 With respect to Nunavut, the following definitions apply for the purposes of sections 77 to 81.

provincial court judge means a judge of the Nunavut Court of Justice. (juge) superior court means a judge of the Court of Appeal of Nunavut. (cour supérieure)

1999, c. 3, s. 64.

77 (1) Subject to section 78, where a provincial court judge makes an order under paragraph 76(a), the applicant for or holder of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval, as the case may be, may appeal to the superior court against the order.

Appeal by Attorney General

(2) Subject to section 78, where a provincial court judge makes an order under paragraph 76(b) or (c),

(a) the Attorney General of Canada may appeal to the superior court against the order, if the order is directed to a chief firearms officer who was designated by the federal Minister, to the Registrar or to the federal Minister; or

(b) the attorney general of the province may appeal to the superior court against the order, in the case of any other order made under paragraph 76(b) or (c).

Notice of appeal

78 (1) An appellant who proposes to appeal an order made under section 76 to the superior court must give notice of appeal not later than thirty days after the order is made.

Extension of time

(2) The superior court may, either before or after the expiration of those thirty days, extend the time within which notice of appeal may be given.

Contents of notice

(3) A notice of appeal must set out the grounds of appeal, together with such further material as the superior court may require.

Appels à la cour supérieure et à la cour d'appel

Définitions

76.1 S'agissant du Nunavut, les définitions qui suivent s'appliquent aux articles 77 à 81.

cour supérieure Un juge de la Cour d'appel du Nunavut. (superior court) juge Juge de la Cour de justice du Nunavut. (provincial court judge)

1999, ch. 3, art. 64.

Cour supérieure

77 (1) Sous réserve de l'article 78, dans le cas où le juge rend la décision prévue à l'alinéa 76a), le demandeur ou le titulaire du permis, du certificat d'enregistrement, de l'agrément ou de l'autorisation peut appeler de l'ordonnance devant la cour supérieure.

Appel par le procureur général

(2) Sous réserve de l'article 78, dans le cas où le juge rend la décision prévue aux alinéas 76b) ou c), le procureur général du Canada ou celui de la province peuvent respectivement appeler de l'ordonnance devant la cour supérieure, selon que celle-ci :

a) soit vise le directeur, le ministre fédéral ou le contrôleur des armes à feu désigné à ce titre par le ministre fédéral;

b) soit porte sur toute autre ordonnance rendue aux termes des alinéas 76b) ou c).

Avis d'appel

78 (1) L'appel est formé par le dépôt d'un avis dans les trente jours suivant l'ordonnance contestée.

Prorogation du délai

(2) La cour supérieure peut, avant ou après l'expiration du délai de trente jours, proroger le délai de dépôt de l'avis.

Teneur de l'avis

(3) L'avis doit préciser les motifs de l'appel et comporter tout autre élément exigé par la cour supérieure.

Service of notice

(4) A copy of any notice of appeal filed with the superior court under subsection (1) and of any further material required to be filed with it shall be served within fourteen days after the filing of the notice, unless before or after the expiration of those fourteen days further time is allowed by the superior court, on

(a) the Attorney General of Canada, in the case of an appeal of an order made under paragraph 76(a) confirming a decision of a chief firearms officer who was designated by the federal Minister, of the Registrar or of the federal Minister;

(b) the attorney general of the province, in the case of an appeal against any other order made under paragraph 76(a);

(c) the applicant for or holder of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval, in the case of an appeal against an order made under paragraph 76(b) or (c); and

(d) any other person specified by the superior court.

Disposition of appeal

79 (1) On the hearing of an appeal, the superior court may

(a) dismiss the appeal; or

(b) allow the appeal and, in the case of an appeal against an order made under paragraph 76(a),

(i) direct the chief firearms officer or Registrar to issue a licence, registration certificate or authorization or direct the provincial minister to approve a shooting club or shooting range, or

(ii) cancel the revocation of the licence, registration certificate, authorization or approval or the decision of the chief firearms officer under section 67.

Burden on applicant

(2) A superior court shall dispose of an appeal against an order made under paragraph 76(a) by dismissing it, unless the appellant establishes to the satisfaction of the court that a disposition referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is justified.

Appeal to court of appeal

80 An appeal to the court of appeal may, with leave of that court or of a judge of that court, be taken against a decision of a superior court under section 79 on any ground that involves a question of law alone.

Signification de l'avis

(4) Une copie de l'avis, ainsi que de tout autre élément dont la production avec celui-ci est exigée, est signifiée dans les quatorze jours suivant son dépôt, ou dans le délai prorogé par la cour supérieure avant ou après l'expiration des quatorze jours :

a) au procureur général du Canada, lorsque l'appel porte sur l'ordonnance prévue à l'alinéa 76a) confirmant la décision du contrôleur des armes à feu désigné à ce titre par le ministre fédéral, du directeur ou du ministre fédéral;

b) au procureur général de la province, lorsque l'appel porte sur toute autre ordonnance rendue aux termes de l'alinéa 76a);

c) au requérant lorsque l'appel porte sur l'ordonnance prévue aux alinéas 76b) ou c);

d) à toute autre personne précisée par la cour supérieure.

Décision

79 (1) Au terme de l'audition de l'appel, la cour supérieure peut :

a) le rejeter;

b) l'accueillir et, dans les cas où il porte sur l'ordonnance prévue à l'alinéa 76a), soit annuler la révocation ou la décision prise par le contrôleur des armes à feu aux termes de l'article 67, soit ordonner à celui-ci ou au directeur de délivrer un permis, un certificat d'enregistrement ou une autorisation ou enjoindre au ministre provincial de conférer l'agrément au club de tir ou au champ de tir.

Charge de la preuve

(2) Lors de l'audition d'un appel portant sur l'ordonnance prévue à l'alinéa 76a), il appartient à l'appelant de convaincre la cour supérieure qu'elle doit rendre la décision visée à l'alinéa (1)b).

Cour d'appel

80 Un appel à la cour d'appel portant sur la décision visée à l'article 79 peut, avec l'autorisation de celle-ci ou d'un de ses juges, être interjeté pour tout motif qui comporte une question de droit seulement.

Application of Part XXVII of the Criminal Code

81 Part XXVII of the Criminal Code, except sections 785 to 812, 816 to 819 and 829 to 838, applies in respect of an appeal under this Act, with such modifications as the circumstances require and as if each reference in that Part to the appeal court were a reference to the superior court.

Commissioner of Firearms

Appointment

81.1 The Governor in Council may appoint a person to be known as the Commissioner of Firearms to hold office during pleasure. The Commissioner shall be paid such remuneration as the Governor in Council may fix.

2003, c. 8, s. 48.

Duties, functions and powers

81.2 Subject to any direction that the federal Minister may give, the Commissioner may exercise the powers and shall perform the duties and functions relating to the administration of this Act that are delegated to the Commissioner by the federal Minister.

2003, c. 8, s. 48.

Delegation — federal Minister

81.3 The federal Minister may delegate to the Commissioner any duty, function or power conferred on the federal Minister under this Act, except the power to delegate under this section and the power under subsections 97(2) and (3).

2003, c. 8, s. 48.

Incapacity or vacancy

81.4 In the event of the absence or incapacity of, or vacancy in the office of, the Commissioner, the federal Minister may appoint a person to perform the duties and functions and exercise the powers of the Commissioner, but no person may be so appointed for a term of more than 60 days without the approval of the Governor in Council.

2003, c. 8, s. 48.

Superannuation and compensation

81.5 The Commissioner shall be deemed to be a person employed in the Public Service for the purposes of the Public Service Superannuation Act and to be employed in the public service of Canada for the purposes of the Government Employees Compensation Act and any regulations made pursuant to section 9 of the Aeronautics Act.

2003, c. 8, s. 48.

Partie XXVII du Code criminel

81 La partie XXVII du Code criminel, sauf les articles 785 à 812, 816 à 819 et 829 à 838, s'applique, avec les adaptations nécessaires, aux appels interjetés aux termes de la présente loi et la mention de la cour d'appel dans cette partie vaut celle de la cour supérieure.

d) tout autre renseignement réglementaire.

Destruction des fichiers

(2) Le contrôleur des armes à feu peut détruire les fichiers selon les modalités de temps et dans les situations prévues par règlement.

Notification au directeur

88 Le contrôleur des armes à feu qui est informé de la perte, du vol ou de la destruction d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte en informe sans délai à son tour le directeur. Il fait de même relativement à celles qui sont trouvées.

1995, ch. 39, art. 88; 2012, ch. 6, art. 24.

Notification des ordonnances d'interdiction

Notification au directeur

89 Tout tribunal, juge ou juge de paix qui rend, modifie ou révoque une ordonnance d'interdiction avise sans délai le contrôleur des armes à feu de ce fait.

Accès au registre

Droit d'accès

90 Le directeur et le contrôleur des armes à feu ont réciproquement accès aux registres qu'ils tiennent respectivement aux termes de l'article 87 et aux termes des articles 83 ou 85; le contrôleur des armes à feu a également accès aux registres tenus par les autres contrôleurs des armes à feu aux termes de l'article 87.

Right of access — subsection 23.1(1)

90.1 For the purpose of subsection 23.1(1), the person responding to a request made under that subsection has a right of access to records kept by a chief firearms officer under section 87.

2012, c. 6, s. 25.

Droit d'accès — paragraphe 23.1(1)

90.1 Pour l'application du paragraphe 23.1(1), la personne qui donne suite à la demande a accès aux registres tenus par le contrôleur des armes à feu aux termes de l'article 87.

2012, ch. 6, art. 25.

Electronic Filing

Electronic filing

91 (1) Subject to the regulations, notices and documents that are sent to or issued by the Registrar pursuant to this or any other Act of Parliament may be sent or issued in electronic or other form in any manner specified by the Registrar.

Time of receipt

(2) For the purposes of this Act and Part III of the Criminal Code, a notice or document that is sent or issued in accordance with subsection (1) is deemed to have been received at the time and date provided by the regulations.

Records of Registrar

92 (1) Records required by section 83 or 85 to be kept by the Registrar may

(a) be in bound or loose-leaf form or in photographic film form; or

(b) be entered or recorded by any system of mechanical or electronic data processing or by any other information storage device that is capable of reproducing any required information in intelligible written or printed form within a reasonable time.

Storage of documents or information in electronic or other form

(2) Subject to the regulations, a document or information received by the Registrar under this Act in electronic or other form may be entered or recorded by any information storage device, including any system of mechanical or electronic data processing, that is capable of reproducing stored documents or information in intelligible written or printed form within a reasonable time.

Probative value

(3) Where the Registrar maintains a record of a document otherwise than in written or printed form, an extract from that record that is certified by the Registrar has the same probative value as the document would have had if it had been proved in the ordinary way.

Transmission électronique

Transmission électronique

91 (1) Sous réserve des règlements, les avis ou documents que le directeur envoie ou reçoit aux termes de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale peuvent être transmis sur support électronique ou autre de la manière précisée par lui.

Date de réception

(2) Pour l'application de la présente loi et de la partie III du Code criminel, les avis et documents ainsi transmis sont réputés avoir été reçus à la date et à l'heure réglementaires.

Forme des registres

92 (1) Les registres tenus par le directeur aux termes des articles 83 ou 85 peuvent être reliés, ou conservés soit sous forme de feuilles mobiles ou de films, soit à l'aide de tout procédé mécanique ou électronique de traitement des données ou de mise en mémoire de l'information capable de restituer en clair, dans un délai raisonnable, les renseignements demandés.

Mise en mémoire

(2) Sous réserve des règlements, les documents ou renseignements reçus par le directeur en application de la présente loi sur support électronique ou autre peuvent être mis en mémoire par tout procédé, notamment mécanographique ou informatique, capable de les restituer en clair dans un délai raisonnable.

Force probante

(3) En cas de conservation de documents par le directeur sous une forme non écrite, les extraits qui en sont certifiés conformes par celui-ci ont, sauf preuve contraire, la même force probante que des originaux écrits.

Reports

Report to federal Minister

93 (1) The Commissioner shall, as soon as possible after the end of each calendar year and at any other times that the federal Minister may in writing request, submit to the federal Minister a report, in the form and including the information that the federal Minister may direct, with regard to the administration of this Act.

Report to be laid before Parliament

(2) The federal Minister shall have each report laid before each House of Parliament on any of the first 15 days on which that House is sitting after the federal Minister receives it.

1995, c. 39, s. 93; 2003, c. 8, s. 50.

Information to be submitted to Commissioner

94 A chief firearms officer shall submit to the Commissioner the prescribed information with regard to the administration of this Act at the prescribed time and in the prescribed form for the purpose of enabling the Commissioner to compile the reports referred to in section 93.

1995, c. 39, s. 94; 2003, c. 8, s. 50.

General

Agreements with Provinces

Agreements with provinces

95 The federal Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces

(a) providing for payment of compensation by Canada to the provinces in respect of administrative costs actually incurred by the provinces in relation to processing licences, registration certificates and authorizations and applications for licences, registration certificates and authorizations and the operation of the Canadian Firearms Registration System; and

(b) notwithstanding subsections 17(1) and (4) of the Financial Administration Act, authorizing the governments of the provinces to withhold those costs, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the agreement, from fees under paragraph 117(p) collected or received by the governments of the provinces.

Rapports

Rapport au ministre fédéral

93 (1) Le commissaire, dès que possible au début de chaque année civile et chaque fois que le ministre fédéral lui en fait la demande par écrit, transmet à celui-ci un rapport sur l'application de la présente loi rédigé en la forme et contenant les renseignements qu'il exige.

Rapport au Parlement

1995, ch. 39, art. 93; 2003, ch. 8, art. 50.

Communication de renseignements au commissaire

1995, ch. 39, art. 94; 2003, ch. 8, art. 50.

Dispositions générales

Accords avec les provinces

Conclusion des accords

95 Le ministre fédéral peut, avec l'agrément du gouverneur en conseil, conclure des accords avec les gouvernements provinciaux :

a) prévoyant le paiement de compensation par le Canada des frais administratifs effectivement exposés par les provinces en ce qui concerne le traitement des permis, des certificats d'enregistrement et des autorisations, des demandes y afférentes ainsi que le fonctionnement du système canadien d'enregistrement des armes à feu;

b) autorisant, par dérogation aux paragraphes 17(1) et (4) de la Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques, ces gouvernements à prélever, conformément aux modalités des accords, le montant de ces frais sur les sommes perçues ou reçues en application de l'alinéa 117p).

Other Matters

Other obligations not affected

96 The issuance of a licence, registration certificate or authorization under this Act does not affect the obligation of any person to comply with any other Act of Parliament or any regulation made under an Act of Parliament respecting firearms or other weapons.

Exemptions — Governor in Council

97 (1) Subject to subsection (4), the Governor in Council may exempt any class of non-residents from the application of any provision of this Act or the regulations, or from the application of any of sections 91 to 95, 99 to 101, 103 to 107 and 117.03 of the Criminal Code, for any period specified by the Governor in Council.

Exemptions — federal Minister

(2) Subject to subsection (4), the federal Minister may exempt any non-resident from the application of any provision of this Act or the regulations, or from the application of any of sections 91 to 95, 99 to 101, 103 to 107 and 117.03 of the Criminal Code, for any period not exceeding one year.

Exemptions — provincial minister

(3) Subject to subsection (4), a provincial minister may exempt from the application in that province of any provision of this Act or the regulations or Part III of the Criminal Code, for any period not exceeding one year, the employees, in respect of any thing done by them in the course of or for the purpose of their duties or employment, of any business that holds a licence authorizing the business to acquire prohibited firearms, prohibited weapons, prohibited devices or prohibited ammunition.

Public safety

(4) Subsections (1) to (3) do not apply if it is not desirable, in the interests of the safety of any person, that the exemption be granted.

Conditions

(5) The authority granting an exemption may attach to it any reasonable condition that the authority considers desirable in the particular circumstances and in the interests of the safety of any person.

1995, c. 39, s. 97; 2001, c. 41, s. 96.

Autres questions

Autres obligations

96 La délivrance d'un permis, d'un certificat d'enregistrement ou d'une autorisation en vertu de la présente loi ne porte pas atteinte à l'obligation de quiconque de se conformer à toute autre loi fédérale ou à ses règlements concernant les armes à feu et d'autres armes.

Dispenses — gouverneur en conseil

97 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), le gouverneur en conseil peut dispenser toute catégorie de non-résidents de l'application de toute autre disposition de la présente loi, de ses règlements ou des articles 91 à 95, 99 à 101, 103 à 107 et 117.03 du Code criminel pour la période qu'il spécifie.

Dispenses — ministre fédéral

(2) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), le ministre fédéral peut dispenser tout non-résident de l'application de toute autre disposition de la présente loi, de ses règlements ou des articles 91 à 95, 99 à 101, 103 à 107 et 117.03 du Code criminel pour une période maximale d'un an.

Dispenses — ministre provincial

(3) Sous réserve du paragraphe (4), le ministre provincial peut dispenser les employés d'une entreprise titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir des armes à feu prohibées, des armes prohibées, des dispositifs prohibés ou des munitions prohibées, agissant dans le cadre de leurs fonctions, de l'application dans sa province de toute autre disposition de la présente loi, de ses règlements ou de la partie III du Code criminel pour une période maximale d'un an.

Sécurité publique

(4) Les paragraphes (1) à (3) ne s'appliquent pas lorsque la dispense n'est pas souhaitable pour la sécurité de quiconque.

Conditions

(5) L'autorité accordant la dispense peut l'assortir des conditions raisonnables qu'elle estime souhaitables dans les circonstances et en vue de la sécurité de quiconque.

1995, ch. 39, art. 97; 2001, ch. 41, art. 96.

Delegation

Authorized chief firearms officer may perform functions of provincial minister

98 A chief firearms officer of a province who is authorized in writing by a provincial minister may perform the function of the provincial minister of designating firearms officers for the province.

Designated officers may perform functions of chief firearms officers

99 A firearms officer who is designated in writing by a chief firearms officer may perform any of the duties and functions of the chief firearms officer under this Act or Part III of the Criminal Code that are specified in the designation.

1995, c. 39, s. 99; 2003, c. 8, s. 52.

Designated officers may perform functions of Registrar

100 A person who is designated in writing by the Registrar for the purpose of this section may perform such duties and functions of the Registrar under this Act or Part III of the Criminal Code as are specified in the designation.

Inspection

Definition of "inspector"

101 In sections 102 to 105, inspector means a firearms officer and includes, in respect of a province, a member of a class of individuals designated by the provincial minister.

Inspection

102 (1) Subject to section 104, for the purpose of ensuring compliance with this Act and the regulations, an inspector may at any reasonable time enter and inspect any place where the inspector believes on reasonable grounds a business is being carried on or there is a record of a business, any place in which the inspector believes on reasonable grounds there is a gun collection or a record in relation to a gun collection or any place in which the inspector believes on reasonable grounds there is a prohibited firearm or there are more than 10 firearms and may

(a) open any container that the inspector believes on reasonable grounds contains a firearm or other thing in respect of which this Act or the regulations apply;

(b) examine any firearm and examine any other thing that the inspector finds and take samples of it;

Délégation

Attributions du ministre provincial

98 Le contrôleur des armes à feu d'une province peut, s'il en est chargé par le ministre provincial, désigner les préposés aux armes à feu pour la province.

Attributions du contrôleur des armes à feu

99 Le préposé aux armes à feu désigné par écrit par le contrôleur des armes à feu peut exercer les attributions, précisées dans la désignation, que la présente loi et la partie III du Code criminel confèrent à ce dernier.

1995, ch. 39, art. 99; 2003, ch. 8, art. 52.

Attributions du directeur

100 La personne désignée par écrit par le directeur pour l'application du présent article peut exercer les attributions de celui-ci, précisées dans l'acte de délégation, que lui confèrent la présente loi et la partie III du Code criminel.

Visite

Définition de « inspecteur »

101 Pour l'application des articles 102 à 105, inspecteur s'entend d'un préposé aux armes à feu. Y est assimilé, pour une province, tout membre d'une catégorie de particuliers désignée par le ministre provincial.

Visite

102 (1) Sous réserve de l'article 104, pour l'application de la présente loi et de ses règlements, l'inspecteur peut, à toute heure convenable, procéder à la visite de tous lieux et y effectuer des inspections, s'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire que s'y déroulent les activités d'une entreprise ou que s'y trouvent soit des registres d'entreprises soit une collection d'armes à feu ou des registres y afférents, soit des armes à feu prohibées ou plus de dix armes à feu; il est aussi autorisé à :

a) ouvrir tout contenant dans lequel, à son avis, se trouvent des armes à feu ou des objets assujettis à l'application de la présente loi ou de ses règlements;

b) examiner les armes à feu ou tout objet qu'il y trouve et en prendre des échantillons;

c) effectuer des essais, des analyses et des mesures;

(c) conduct any tests or analyses or take any measurements; and

(d) require any person to produce for examination or copying any records, books of account or other documents that the inspector believes on reasonable grounds contain information that is relevant to the enforcement of this Act or the regulations.

Operation of data processing systems and copying equipment

(2) In carrying out an inspection of a place under subsection (1), an inspector may

(a) use or cause to be used any data processing system at the place to examine any data contained in or available to the system;

(b) reproduce any record or cause it to be reproduced from the data in the form of a print-out or other intelligible output and remove the print-out or other output for examination or copying; and

(c) use or cause to be used any copying equipment at the place to make copies of any record, book of account or other document.

Use of force

(3) In carrying out an inspection of a place under subsection (1), an inspector may not use force.

Receipt for things taken

(4) An inspector who takes any thing while carrying out an inspection of a place under subsection (1) must give to the owner or occupant of the place at the time that the thing is taken a receipt for the thing that describes the thing with reasonable precision, including, in the case of a firearm, the serial number if available of the firearm.

Definition of "business"

(5) For greater certainty, in this section, business has the meaning assigned by subsection 2(1).

Duty to assist inspectors

103 The owner or person in charge of a place that is inspected by an inspector under section 102 and every person found in the place shall

(a) give the inspector all reasonable assistance to enable him or her to carry out the inspection and exercise any power conferred by section 102; and

(b) provide the inspector with any information relevant to the enforcement of this Act or the regulations that he or she may reasonably require.

d) exiger de toute personne qu'elle lui fournisse pour examen ou copie les registres, documents comptables ou autres documents qui à son avis contiennent des renseignements utiles à l'application de la présente loi ou de ses règlements.

Dans tous les cas, l'avis de l'inspecteur doit être fondé sur des motifs raisonnables.

Usage d'ordinateurs et de photocopieuses

(2) Dans le cadre de sa visite, l'inspecteur peut :

a) utiliser ou faire utiliser les systèmes informatiques se trouvant sur place afin de prendre connaissance des données qui y sont contenues ou auxquelles ces systèmes donnent accès;

b) à partir de ces données, reproduire ou faire reproduire le document sous forme d'imprimé ou toute autre forme intelligible, qu'il peut emporter pour examen ou reproduction;

c) utiliser ou faire utiliser les appareils de reprographie se trouvant sur place pour faire des copies de tout registre, document comptable ou autre document.

Usage de la force

(3) Dans le cadre de la visite prévue au paragraphe (1), l'inspecteur ne peut faire usage de la force.

Récépissé des objets saisis

(4) L'inspecteur est tenu de remettre au propriétaire ou à l'occupant des lieux, au moment où il en prend possession, un récépissé qui décrit avec suffisamment de précision les objets pris dans le cadre de sa visite, notamment, s'il s'agit d'une arme à feu, par la mention du numéro de série, si celui-ci est disponible.

Précision interprétative

(5) Il est entendu qu'au présent article, « entreprise » s'entend au sens prévu au paragraphe 2(1).

Obligation d'assistance

103 Le propriétaire ou le responsable du lieu qui fait l'objet de la visite, ainsi que toute personne qui s'y trouve, sont tenus d'accorder à l'inspecteur sur demande, toute l'assistance possible dans l'exercice de ses fonctions et de lui donner les renseignements qu'il peut valablement exiger dans le cadre de l'application de la présente loi ou de ses règlements.

Inspection of dwelling-house

104 (1) An inspector may not enter a dwelling-house under section 102 except

(a) on reasonable notice to the owner or occupant, except where a business is being carried on in the dwelling-house; and

(b) with the consent of the occupant or under a warrant.

Authority to issue warrant

(2) A justice who on ex parte application is satisfied by information on oath

(a) that the conditions for entry described in section 102 exist in relation to a dwelling-house,

(b) that entry to the dwelling-house is necessary for any purpose relating to the enforcement of this Act or the regulations, and

(c) that entry to the dwelling-house has been refused or that there are reasonable grounds for believing that entry will be refused may issue a warrant authorizing the inspector named in it to enter that dwelling-house subject to any conditions that may be specified in the warrant.

Areas that may be inspected

(3) For greater certainty, an inspector who is carrying out an inspection of a dwelling-house may enter and inspect only

(a) that part of a room of the dwelling-house in which the inspector believes on reasonable grounds there is a firearm, prohibited weapon, restricted weapon, prohibited device, prohibited ammunition, a record in relation to a gun collection or all or part of a device or other thing required by a regulation made under paragraph 117(h) respecting the storage of firearms and restricted weapons; and

(b) in addition, in the case of a dwelling-house where the inspector believes on reasonable grounds a business is being carried on, that part of a room in which the inspector believes on reasonable grounds there is ammunition or a record of the business.

1995, c. 39, s. 104; 2003, c. 8, s. 53(F).

Demand to produce firearm

105 An inspector who believes on reasonable grounds that a person possesses a firearm may, by demand made to that person, require that person, within a reasonable time after the demand is made, to produce the firearm in

Mandat — maison d'habitation

104 (1) Dans le cas d'une maison d'habitation, l'inspecteur ne peut toutefois procéder à la visite :

a) sans préavis raisonnable donné au propriétaire ou à l'occupant, à moins que s'y déroulent les activités d'une entreprise;

b) sans l'autorisation de l'occupant que s'il est muni d'un mandat.

Délivrance du mandat

(2) Sur demande ex parte, le juge de paix peut signer un mandat autorisant, sous réserve des conditions éventuellement fixées, l'inspecteur qui y est nommé à procéder à la visite d'une maison d'habitation s'il est convaincu, sur la foi d'une dénonciation sous serment, que sont réunis les éléments suivants :

a) les circonstances prévues à l'article 102 existent;

b) la visite est nécessaire pour l'application de la présente loi ou de ses règlements;

c) un refus a été opposé à la visite ou il y a des motifs raisonnables de croire que tel sera le cas.

Parties visées par l'inspection

(3) Il est entendu, que lors de l'inspection d'une maison d'habitation, l'inspecteur ne peut visiter et inspecter que les parties d'une pièce où, à son avis :

a) se trouvent soit des armes à feu, armes prohibées, armes à autorisation restreinte, dispositifs prohibés, munitions prohibées ou des registres relatifs à une collection d'armes à feu soit tout ou partie d'un dispositif ou d'un autre objet exigé, par règlement pris en vertu de l'alinéa 117h), pour l'entreposage des armes à feu et des armes à autorisation restreinte;

b) dans le cas où il a des motifs raisonnables de croire que s'y déroulent les activités d'une entreprise, se trouvent des munitions ou des registres d'entreprise.

Dans tous les cas, l'avis de l'inspecteur doit être fondé sur des motifs raisonnables.

1995, ch. 39, art. 104; 2003, ch. 8, art. 53(F).

Contrôle

105 S'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'une personne possède une arme à feu, l'inspecteur peut lui ordonner de présenter, dans un délai raisonnable suivant la demande et de la manière indiquée par l'inspecteur, cette

w) prendre toute mesure réglementaire prévue par la présente loi.

1995, ch. 39, art. 117; 2003, ch. 8, art. 54, ch. 22, art. 224(A); 2015, ch. 27, art. 16; 2019, ch. 9, art. 13.

Laying of proposed regulations

118 (1) Subject to subsection (2), the federal Minister shall have each proposed regulation laid before each House of Parliament.

Idem

(2) Where a proposed regulation is laid pursuant to subsection (1), it shall be laid before each House of Parliament on the same day.

Report by committee

(3) Each proposed regulation that is laid before a House of Parliament shall, on the day it is laid, be referred by that House to an appropriate committee of that House, as determined by the rules of that House, and the committee may conduct inquiries or public hearings with respect to the proposed regulation and report its findings to that House.

Making of regulations

(4) A proposed regulation that has been laid pursuant to subsection (1) may be made

(a) on the expiration of thirty sitting days after it was laid; or

(b) where, with respect to each House of Parliament,

(i) the committee reports to the House, or

(ii) the committee decides not to conduct inquiries or public hearings.

Definition of "sitting day"

(5) For the purpose of this section, sitting day means a day on which either House of Parliament sits.

Dépôt des projets de règlement

118 (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (3), le ministre fédéral fait déposer tout projet de règlement devant chaque chambre du Parlement.

Idem

(2) Lorsqu'il fait déposer un projet de règlement en vertu du paragraphe (1), le ministre fédéral le fait déposer devant les deux chambres du Parlement le même jour.

Étude en comité et rapport

(3) Tout comité compétent, d'après le règlement de chacune des chambres du Parlement, est automatiquement saisi du projet de règlement et peut effectuer une enquête ou tenir des audiences publiques à cet égard et faire rapport de ses conclusions à la chambre en cause.

Prise des règlements

(4) Le règlement peut être pris :

a) soit dans un délai de trente jours de séance suivant le dépôt;

b) soit au moment, pour chaque chambre du Parlement, où, selon le cas :

(i) le comité fait rapport,

(ii) il décide de ne pas effectuer d'enquête ou de ne pas tenir d'audiences publiques.

Définition de « jour de séance »

(5) Pour l'application du présent article, jour de séance s'entend d'un jour où l'une ou l'autre chambre siège.

Exception

119 (1) No proposed regulation that has been laid pursuant to section 118 need again be laid under that section, whether or not it has been altered.

Exception — minor changes

(2) A regulation made under section 117 may be made without being laid before either House of Parliament if the federal Minister is of the opinion that the changes made by the regulation to an existing regulation are so immaterial or insubstantial that section 118 should not be applicable in the circumstances.

Exception — urgency

(3) A regulation made under paragraph 117(i), (l), (m), (n), (o), (q), (s) or (t) may be made without being laid before either House of Parliament if the federal Minister is of the opinion that the making of the regulation is so urgent that section 118 should not be applicable in the circumstances.

Notice of opinion

(4) Where the federal Minister forms the opinion described in subsection (2) or (3), he or she shall have a statement of the reasons why he or she formed that opinion laid before each House of Parliament.

Exception — prescribed dates

(5) A regulation may be made under paragraph 117(w) prescribing a date for the purposes of the application of any provision of this Act without being laid before either House of Parliament.

Part III of the Criminal Code

(6) For greater certainty, a regulation may be made under Part III of the Criminal Code without being laid before either House of Parliament.

Modification du projet de règlement

119 (1) Il n'est pas nécessaire de déposer de nouveau le projet de règlement devant le Parlement même s'il a subi des modifications.

Exception : modifications mineures

(2) L'obligation de dépôt prévue à l'article 118 ne s'applique pas aux projets de règlements d'application de l'article 117, si le ministre fédéral estime que ceux-ci n'apportent pas de modification de fond notable à des règlements existants.

Exception : cas d'urgence

(3) Les règlements d'application des alinéas 117i), l), m), n), o), q), s) ou t) peuvent être pris sans avoir auparavant été déposés devant l'une ou l'autre chambre du Parlement, si le ministre fédéral estime que l'urgence de la situation justifie une dérogation à l'article 118.

Notification au Parlement

(4) Le ministre fédéral fait déposer devant chaque chambre du Parlement une déclaration énonçant les justificatifs sur lesquels il fonde, en application des paragraphes (2) ou (3), sa dérogation à l'article 118.

Exception : date réglementaire

(5) Tout règlement fixant, aux termes de l'alinéa 117w), une date pour l'application d'une disposition de la présente loi peut être pris sans avoir été déposé devant l'une ou l'autre chambre du Parlement.

Partie III du Code criminel

(6) Il est entendu que le dépôt n'est pas obligatoire pour les règlements d'application de la partie III du Code criminel.

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day;

(c) had not ceased to be in force or have any effect on October 30, 1992 under section 34 of An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, chapter 40 of the Statutes of Canada, 1991; and

(d) remained in force pursuant to subsection 110(5) of the former Act on the commencement day.

Expiration

(2) A permit that is deemed to be a licence expires on the earlier of

(a) the expiration of the period for which the permit was expressed to be issued, and

(b) one year after the commencement day.

Geographical extent

124 A permit or an approval of a museum that is deemed to be a licence under section 122 or 123 is valid only for the location of the business or museum for which it was issued.

Industrial purpose designations

125 (1) A designation of a person is deemed to be a licence if it

(a) was made under subsection 90(3.1) or paragraph 95(3)(b) of the former Act; and

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day.

Permis d'exploitation d'une entreprise

123 (1) Est réputé un permis délivré en vertu de l'article 56 le permis d'exploitation d'une entreprise visé aux alinéas 105(1)a) ou b) ou au sous-alinéa 105(2)b)(i) de la loi antérieure qui :

a) a été :

(i) délivré en application du paragraphe 110(5) de la loi antérieure,

(ii) prorogé par les paragraphes 6(2) de la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 38 des Statuts du Canada de 1968-1969, ou 48(1) de la Loi de 1977 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 53 des Statuts du Canada de 1976-1977;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence;

c) n'a pas cessé d'être en vigueur le 30 octobre 1992 en application de l'article 34 de la Loi modifiant le Code criminel et le Tarif des douanes en conséquence, chapitre 40 des Lois du Canada (1991);

d) était valide à la date de référence conformément au paragraphe 110(5) de la loi antérieure.

Durée de validité

(2) Il est valide pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut dépasser un an suivant la date de référence.

Emplacement

124 Le permis ou l'agrément d'un musée réputé un permis délivré en vertu de l'article 56 en application des articles 122 ou 123 est valide seulement pour l'établissement de l'entreprise ou du musée pour lequel il a été délivré.

Désignations industrielles

125 (1) Est réputée un permis la désignation d'une personne :

a) effectuée en vertu du paragraphe 90(3.1) ou de l'alinéa 95(3)b) de la loi antérieure;

b) non révoquée avant la date de référence.

Geographical extent

(2) A designation of a person that is deemed to be a licence is valid only in the province in which it was made.

Expiration

(3) A designation of a person that is deemed to be a licence expires on the earliest of

(a) the expiration of the period for which it was expressed to be made,

(b) one year after the commencement day, and

(c) in the case of a designation of a person who holds a permit that is deemed to be a licence under section 123, the expiration of the permit.

Pending applications

126 Every application that was pending on the commencement day for a document that would be a document referred to in any of sections 120 to 125 had it been issued before the commencement day shall be dealt with and disposed of under and in accordance with the former Act, except that

(a) a licence shall be issued instead of issuing a firearms acquisition certificate or a permit or making an approval or designation; and

(b) only a person who has authority under this Act to issue a licence may finally dispose of the application.

Registration Certificates

Registration certificates

127 (1) A registration certificate is deemed to be a registration certificate issued under section 60 if it

(a) was

(i) issued under subsection 109(7) of the former Act, or

(ii) continued under subsection 6(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada, 1968-69, or subsection 48(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1977, chapter 53 of the Statutes of Canada, 1976-77; and

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day.

Territoire de validité

(2) Une telle désignation est valide seulement dans la province où elle a été effectuée.

Durée de validité

(3) Sa durée de validité est la période mentionnée ou, dans le cas de la désignation du titulaire d'un permis réputé, en application de l'article 123, un permis délivré en vertu de l'article 56, celle du permis visé à l'article 123, qui ne peut excéder d'un an la date de référence.

Demandes en cours

126 Les demandes de délivrance des documents — qui seraient visés aux articles 120 à 125 s'ils avaient été délivrés avant la date de référence — en cours à la date de référence sont traitées conformément à la loi antérieure, à la différence près que :

a) un permis remplace les anciens permis, agréments, désignations ou autorisations d'acquisition;

b) seule une personne habilitée par la présente loi à délivrer un permis peut statuer à leur égard.

Certificats d'enregistrement

Certificats d'enregistrement

127 (1) Est réputé un certificat d'enregistrement délivré en application de l'article 60 le certificat d'enregistrement qui :

a) a été :

(i) soit délivré en vertu du paragraphe 109(7) de la loi antérieure,

(ii) soit prorogé par les paragraphes 6(2) de la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 38 des Statuts du Canada de 1968-1969, ou 48(1) de la Loi de 1977 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 53 des Statuts du Canada de 1976-1977;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence.

Expiration

(2) A registration certificate that is deemed to be a registration certificate issued under section 60 expires on the earlier of

(a) its expiration under section 66, and

(b) December 31, 2002, or such other date as is prescribed.

Durée de validité

(2) Un tel certificat d'enregistrement — qui n'a pas expiré en application de l'article 66 — est valide pour la période se terminant le 31 décembre 2002 ou à la date prévue par règlement, si celle-ci est antérieure.

Pending applications

128 Every application for a registration certificate that was pending on the commencement day shall be dealt with and disposed of under and in accordance with the former Act, except that only a person who has authority under this Act to issue a registration certificate may finally dispose of the application.

Demandes en cours

128 Les demandes de certificat d'enregistrement en cours à la date de référence sont traitées conformément à la loi antérieure, à la différence près que seule une personne habilitée par la présente loi à délivrer les certificats d'enregistrement peut statuer à leur égard.

Authorized Transportation of Firearms

Transport d'armes à feu

Permit to carry

129 (1) A permit authorizing a person to possess a particular prohibited firearm or restricted firearm is deemed to be an authorization to carry or authorization to transport if it

(a) was

(i) issued under subsection 110(1) of the former Act, or

(ii) continued under subsection 6(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada, 1968-69, or subsection 48(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1977, chapter 53 of the Statutes of Canada, 1976-77;

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day; and

(c) remained in force pursuant to subsection 110(1) of the former Act on the commencement day.

Permis de port

129 (1) Le permis autorisant une personne à posséder une arme à feu prohibée ou une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte en particulier est réputé une autorisation de port ou de transport s'il :

a) a été :

(i) soit délivré en application du paragraphe 110(1) de la loi antérieure,

(ii) soit prorogé par les paragraphes 6(2) de la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 38 des Statuts du Canada de 1968-1969, ou 48(1) de la Loi de 1977 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 53 des Statuts du Canada de 1976-1977;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence;

c) était valide à la date de référence conformément au paragraphe 110(1) de la loi antérieure.

Geographical extent

(2) A permit that is deemed to be an authorization to carry or authorization to transport is valid only in the province in which the permit was issued, unless it was endorsed pursuant to subsection 110(10) of the former Act as being valid within the provinces indicated in the permit, in which case it remains valid within those provinces.

Territoire de validité

(2) Un tel permis est valide dans la province de sa délivrance seulement, sauf s'il a été visé en application du paragraphe 110(10) de la loi antérieure pour les provinces mentionnées, auquel cas il le demeure dans celles-ci.

Expiration

(3) A permit that is deemed to be an authorization to carry or authorization to transport expires on the earlier of

(a) the expiration of the period for which it was expressed to be issued, and

(b) two years after the commencement day.

Durée de validité

(3) Il est valide pour la période mentionnée, qui ne peut excéder de plus de deux ans la date de référence.

Temporary permit to carry

130 A permit authorizing a person who does not reside in Canada to possess and carry a particular prohibited firearm or restricted firearm is deemed to be an authorization to transport if it

(a) was issued under subsection 110(2.1) of the former Act;

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day; and

(c) remained in force pursuant to that subsection on the commencement day.

Permis temporaire de port d'armes

130 Est réputé une autorisation de transport tout permis autorisant un non-résident à transporter et à porter au Canada une arme à feu prohibée ou une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte en particulier, s'il :

a) a été délivré en vertu du paragraphe 110(2.1) de la loi antérieure;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence;

c) était valide à la date de référence conformément à ce paragraphe.

Permit to transport or convey

131 A permit authorizing a person to transport or to convey to a local registrar of firearms a particular prohibited firearm or restricted firearm is deemed to be an authorization to transport if it

(a) was

(i) issued under subsection 110(3) or (4) of the former Act, or

(ii) continued under subsection 6(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada, 1968-69, or subsection 48(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1977, chapter 53 of the Statutes of Canada, 1976-77;

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day; and

(c) remained in force pursuant to subsection 110(3) or (4) of the former Act on the commencement day.

Permis de transport

131 Est réputé une autorisation de transport tout permis autorisant une personne à présenter au directeur local de l'enregistrement des armes à feu une arme à feu prohibée ou une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte en particulier, s'il :

a) a été :

(i) soit délivré en vertu des paragraphes 110(3) ou (4) de la loi antérieure,

(ii) soit prorogé par les paragraphes 6(2) de la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 38 des Statuts du Canada de 1968-1969, ou 48(1) de la Loi de 1977 modifiant le droit pénal, chapitre 53 des Statuts du Canada de 1976-1977;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence;

c) était valide à la date de référence conformément aux paragraphes 110(3) ou (4) de la loi antérieure.

Expiration

132 A permit that is deemed to be an authorization to transport under section 130 or 131 expires on the expiration of the period for which the permit was expressed to be issued.

Durée de validité

132 Le permis réputé une autorisation de transport en application des articles 130 ou 131 est valide pour la période mentionnée.

Pending applications

133 Every application that was pending on the commencement day for a document that would be a document referred to in any of sections 129 to 131 had it been issued before the commencement day shall be dealt with and disposed of under and in accordance with the former Act, except that

(a) an authorization to carry or authorization to transport shall be issued or a condition shall be attached to a licence instead of issuing a permit; and

(b) only a person who has authority under this Act to issue an authorization to carry or authorization to transport may finally dispose of the application.

Demandes en cours

133 Les demandes de délivrance des documents — qui seraient prévus aux articles 129 à 131 s'ils avaient été délivrés avant la date de référence — en cours à la date de référence sont traitées conformément à la loi antérieure, à différence près que :

a) le permis qui aurait été délivré devient une autorisation de port ou de transport ou une condition d'un permis;

b) seule une personne habilitée par la présente loi à délivrer l'autorisation de port et de transport peut statuer à leur égard.

Shooting club approvals

134 (1) An approval of a shooting club is deemed to be an approval granted under this Act if the approval

(a) was granted under subparagraph 109(3)(c)(iii) or paragraph 110(2)(c) of the former Act; and

(b) had not been revoked before the commencement day.

Approbations des clubs de tir

134 (1) Est réputée l'agrément prévu par la présente loi toute approbation d'un club de tir accordée en application du sous-alinéa 109(3)c)(iii) ou de l'alinéa 110(2)c) de la loi antérieure et non révoquée avant la date de référence.

Expiration

(2) An approval of a shooting club that is deemed to be an approval granted under this Act expires on the earlier of

(a) the expiration of the period for which it was expressed to be granted, and

(b) one year after the commencement day.

Durée de validité

(2) Une telle approbation est valide pour la période mentionnée, sans que celle-ci puisse excéder d'un an la date de référence.

Temporary storage permit

135 Every permit authorizing a person to temporarily store a particular prohibited firearm or restricted firearm

(a) that was issued under subsection 110(3.1) of the former Act,

(b) that had not been revoked before the commencement day, and

(c) that remained in force pursuant to subsection 110(3.3) of the former Act on the commencement day continues in force until the expiration of the period for which it was expressed to be issued, unless the permit is revoked by a chief firearms officer for any good and sufficient reason.

Permis d'entreposage temporaire

135 Est valide pour la période mentionnée, sauf révocation par le contrôleur des armes à feu pour une raison valable, tout permis autorisant l'entreposage temporaire d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte en particulier, s'il :

a) a été délivré en vertu du paragraphe 110(3.1) de la loi antérieure;

b) n'a pas été révoqué avant la date de référence;

c) était valide à la date de référence conformément au paragraphe 110(3.3) de la loi antérieure.

Permission to view records

28 The Commissioner of Firearms shall permit the Information Commissioner to view — for the purpose of settling the Federal Court proceeding Information Commissioner of Canada v. Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, bearing court file number T-785-15 — any record that was in the Canadian Firearms Registry on April 3, 2015.

— 2019, c. 9, s. 29

Copy to Government of Quebec

29 (1) The Commissioner of Firearms shall — for the purpose of the administration and enforcement of the Firearms Registration Act, chapter 15 of the Statutes of Quebec, 2016 — provide the Quebec Minister with a copy of all records that were in the Canadian Firearms Registry on April 3, 2015 and that relate to firearms registered, as at that day, as non-restricted firearms, if the Quebec Minister provides the Commissioner with a written request to that effect before the end of the 120th day after the day on which the Commissioner sends written notice under subsection (2).

Notice

(2) If no request is provided under subsection (1) before the Commissioner is in a position to proceed with ensuring the destruction of the records referred to in that subsection, the Commissioner shall, as soon as he or she is in that position, send written notice to the Quebec Minister of that fact.

Destruction of records

(3) Despite subsection 29(1) of the Ending the Long-gun Registry Act, the Commissioner shall proceed with ensuring the destruction of the records referred to in subsection (1) only after

(a) he or she provides the Quebec Minister with a copy of the records, in the case where that Minister provides a written request in accordance with subsection (1); or

(b) the end of the 120th day after the day on which the Commissioner sends written notice under subsection (2), in any other case.

Definition of Quebec Minister

(4) In this section, Quebec Minister means the minister of the Government of Quebec responsible for public security.

renseignements personnels ne s'appliquent pas, à compter du 5 avril 2012, relativement aux renseignements personnels.

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 28

Permission de voir des documents

28 Le commissaire aux armes à feu permet au Commissaire à l'information de voir — en vue du règlement de l'affaire Commissaire à l'information du Canada c. Ministre de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile, dont le numéro de dossier à la Cour fédérale est T-785-15 — tout document qui se trouvait dans le Registre canadien des armes à feu le 3 avril 2015.

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 29

Copie au gouvernement du Québec

29 (1) Le commissaire aux armes à feu fournit au ministre du Québec, aux fins de l'exécution et du contrôle d'application de la Loi sur l'immatriculation des armes à feu, chapitre 15 des Lois du Québec (2016), une copie des registres et fichiers qui se trouvaient dans le Registre canadien des armes à feu le 3 avril 2015 et qui concernent les armes à feu qui, à cette date, étaient enregistrées en tant qu'arme à feu sans restriction, si le ministre du Québec en fait la demande par écrit au commissaire au plus tard le cent vingtième jour suivant la date de l'envoi de l'avis écrit au titre du paragraphe (2).

Avis

(2) Si la demande visée au paragraphe (1) n'est pas faite avant que le commissaire soit en mesure de veiller à la destruction des registres et fichiers visés à ce paragraphe, ce dernier envoie un avis écrit au ministre du Québec dès qu'il est prêt à veiller à la destruction des registres et fichiers visés.

Destruction des registres et fichiers

(3) Malgré le paragraphe 29(1) de la Loi sur l'abolition du registre des armes d'épaule, le commissaire aux armes à feu ne veille à la destruction des registres et fichiers visés au paragraphe (1) qu'après :

a) avoir fourni une copie des registres et fichiers au ministre du Québec, dans le cas où ce ministre en fait la demande écrite conformément à ce paragraphe;

b) le cent vingtième jour suivant la date de l'envoi de l'avis écrit au titre du paragraphe (2), dans tout autre cas.

Définition de ministre du Québec

— 2019, c. 9, s. 30

Extension

30 The Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness may, during the 120-day period referred to in subsection 29(1), make an order extending that period for another 120 days, and in that case the references in subsections 29(1) and (3) to "the 120th day" are to be read as references to "the 240th day".

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 30

Prolongation

30 Le ministre de la Sécurité publique et de la Protection civile peut, par arrêté, pendant la période de cent vingt jours visée au paragraphe 29(1), prolonger celle-ci d'une période additionnelle de cent vingt jours. Le cas échéant, la mention « cent vingtième jour » aux paragraphes 29(1) et (3) vaut mention de « deux cent quarantième jour ».

— 2019, ch. 9, par. 4(2) et (3)

2015, c. 27, s. 6.

4 (2) Subsections 19(1.1) and (2) of the Act are replaced by the following:

Target practice or competition

(1.1) In the case of an authorization to transport issued for a reason referred to in paragraph (1)(a) within the province where the holder of the authorization resides, the specified places must — except in the case of an authorization that is issued for a prohibited firearm referred to in subsection 12(9), (11) or (14) — include all shooting clubs and shooting ranges that are approved under section 29 and that are located in that province.

Exception for prohibited firearms other than prohibited handguns

(2) Despite subsection (1), an individual must not be authorized to transport a prohibited firearm — other than a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) or a prohibited firearm referred to in subsection 12(9), (11) or (14) — between specified places except for the purposes referred to in paragraph (1)(b).

2015, ch. 27, art. 6.

4 (2) Les paragraphes 19(1.1) et (2) de la même loi sont remplacés par ce qui suit :

Tir à la cible ou compétition de tir

Exception : armes à feu prohibées autres que les armes de poing prohibées

(2) Malgré le paragraphe (1), le particulier ne peut être autorisé à transporter une arme à feu prohibée — autre qu'une arme de poing visée au paragraphe 12(6.1) ou qu'une arme à feu prohibée visée aux paragraphes 12(9), (11) ou (14) — entre des lieux précis que pour les raisons visées à l'alinéa (1)b).

2015, c. 27, s. 6.

(3) Subsections 19(2.1) to (2.3) of the Act are replaced by the following:

Automatic authorization to transport — licence renewal

(2.1) An individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess restricted firearms or handguns referred to in subsection 12(6.1) must, if the licence is renewed, be authorized to transport them within the individual's province of residence to and from all shooting

2015, ch. 27, art. 6.

(3) Les paragraphes 19(2.1) à (2.3) de la même loi sont remplacés par ce qui suit :

Autorisation automatique de transport : renouvellement

(2.1) Le particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'armes de poing visées au paragraphe 12(6.1) doit, si son permis est renouvelé, être autorisé à les transporter, dans sa province de résidence, vers tout club de tir et tout champ de clubs and shooting ranges that are approved under section 29. However, the authorization does not apply to a restricted firearm or a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) whose transfer to the individual was approved, in accordance with subparagraph 28(b)(ii), for the purpose of having it form part of a gun collection.

Automatic authorization to transport — transfer

(2.2) If a chief firearms officer has authorized the transfer of a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm to an individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess prohibited firearms or restricted firearms, the individual must be authorized to transport the firearm within the individual's province of residence from the place where they acquire it to the place where they may possess it under section 17.

Automatic authorization to transport — transfer

(2.3) If a chief firearms officer has authorized the transfer of a restricted firearm or a handgun referred to in subsection 12(6.1) to an individual who holds a licence authorizing the individual to possess a restricted firearm or such a handgun, the individual must be authorized to transport their restricted firearm or handgun within the individual's province of residence to and from all shooting clubs and shooting ranges that are approved under section 29, unless the transfer of the restricted firearm or handgun was approved, in accordance with subparagraph 28(b)(ii), for the purpose of having it form part of a gun collection.

tir agréés conformément à l'article 29, et à partir de celui-ci. Toutefois, l'autorisation ne s'applique pas à l'arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou à l'arme de poing dont la cession au particulier a été autorisée, en application du sous-alinéa 28b)(ii), à des fins de collection.

Autorisation automatique de transport : cession

(2.2) Si un contrôleur des armes à feu autorise la cession d'une arme à feu prohibée ou d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte à un particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte, le particulier doit, dans sa province de résidence, être autorisé à transporter cette arme à feu du lieu de son acquisition au lieu où elle peut être gardée en vertu de l'article 17.

Autorisation automatique de transport : cession

(2.3) Si un contrôleur des armes à feu autorise la cession d'une arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'une arme de poing visées au paragraphe 12(6.1) à un particulier titulaire d'un permis de possession d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte ou d'une telle arme de poing, le particulier doit, dans sa province de résidence, être autorisé à transporter cette arme à feu vers tout club de tir et tout champ de tir agréés conformément à l'article 29, et à partir de ceux-ci, sauf si la cession de l'arme à feu à autorisation restreinte ou de l'arme de poing a été autorisée, en application du sous-alinéa 28b)(ii), à des fins de collection.

2012, c. 6, s. 11; 2015, c. 27, s. 7.

5 Sections 23 and 23.1 of the Act are replaced by the following:

Authorization to transfer non-restricted firearms

23 (1) A person may transfer one or more non-restricted firearms if, at the time of the transfer,

(a) the transferee holds a licence authorizing the transferee to acquire and possess a non-restricted firearm;

(b) the Registrar has, at the transferor's request, issued a reference number for the transfer and provided it to the transferor; and

(c) the reference number is still valid.

Information — transferee's licence

(2) The transferee shall provide to the transferor the prescribed information that relates to the transferee's licence, for the purpose of enabling the transferor to request that the Registrar issue a reference number for the transfer.

2012, ch. 6, art. 11; 2015, ch. 27, art. 7.

5 Les articles 23 et 23.1 de la même loi sont remplacés par ce qui suit :

Cession d'armes à feu sans restriction

23 (1) La cession d'une ou de plusieurs armes à feu sans restriction est permise si, au moment où elle s'opère :

a) le cessionnaire est effectivement titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir et à posséder une arme à feu sans restriction;

b) sur demande du cédant, le directeur a attribué un numéro de référence à la cession et a informé le cédant de ce numéro;

c) le numéro de référence est toujours valide.

Renseignements liés au permis du cessionnaire

(2) Le cessionnaire fournit au cédant les renseignements réglementaires liés à son permis afin que ce dernier puisse demander au directeur d'attribuer un numéro de référence à la cession.

Reference number

(3) The Registrar shall issue a reference number if he or she is satisfied that the transferee holds and is still eligible to hold a licence authorizing them to acquire and possess a non-restricted firearm.

Period of validity

(4) A reference number is valid for the prescribed period.

Registrar not satisfied

(5) If the Registrar is not satisfied as set out in subsection (3), he or she may so inform the transferor.

— 2019, c. 9, s. 6

2015, c. 27, s. 11.

6 Subsection 54(1) of the Act is replaced by the following:

Applications

54 (1) A licence, registration certificate or authorization, other than an authorization referred to in subsection 19(2.1), (2.2) or (2.3), may be issued only on application made in the prescribed form — which form may be in writing or electronic — or in the prescribed manner. The application must set out the prescribed information and be accompanied by payment of the prescribed fees.

— 2019, c. 9, s. 7

7 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 58:

Conditions — licence issued to business

58.1 (1) A chief firearms officer who issues a licence to a business must attach the following conditions to the licence:

(a) the business must record and, for the prescribed period, keep the prescribed information that relates to the business' possession and disposal of non-restricted firearms;

(b) the business must record and — for a period of 20 years from the day on which the business transfers a non-restricted firearm, or for a longer period that may be prescribed — keep the following information in respect of the transfer:

(i) the reference number issued by the Registrar,

(ii) the day on which the reference number was issued,

(iii) the transferee's licence number, and

Numéro de référence

(3) Le directeur attribue un numéro de référence s'il est convaincu que le cessionnaire est titulaire d'un permis l'autorisant à acquérir et à posséder une arme à feu sans restriction et y est toujours admissible.

Période de validité

(4) Le numéro de référence est valide pour la période réglementaire.

Directeur pas convaincu

(5) Si le directeur n'est pas convaincu de ce qui est prévu au paragraphe (3), il peut en informer le cédant.

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 6

2015, ch. 27, art. 11.

6 Le paragraphe 54(1) de la même loi est remplacé par ce qui suit :

Dépôt d'une demande

54 (1) La délivrance des permis, des autorisations — autres que celles visées aux paragraphes 19(2.1), (2.2) ou (2.3) — et des certificats d'enregistrement est subordonnée au dépôt d'une demande présentée en la forme réglementaire — écrite ou électronique — ou selon les modalités réglementaires et accompagnée des renseignements réglementaires, et à l'acquittement des droits réglementaires.

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 7

7 La même loi est modifiée par adjonction, après l'article 58, de ce qui suit :

Conditions : permis délivré à une entreprise

58.1 (1) Le contrôleur des armes à feu qui délivre un permis à une entreprise assortit ce permis des conditions suivantes :

a) l'entreprise est tenue de noter et de conserver, pendant la période réglementaire, les renseignements réglementaires liés à la possession d'armes à feu sans restriction et à leur disposition;

b) l'entreprise est tenue de noter et de conserver, pendant vingt ans ou pour une période supérieure prévue par règlement à compter de la date de la cession d'une arme à feu sans restriction, les renseignements suivants :

(i) le numéro de référence attribué par le directeur,

(ii) la date à laquelle le numéro de référence a été attribué,

(iii) le numéro de permis du cessionnaire,

(iv) the firearm's make, model and type and, if any, its serial number; and

(c) the business must, unless otherwise directed by a chief firearms officer, transmit any records containing the information referred to in paragraph (a) or (b) to a prescribed official if it is determined that the business will cease to be a business.

(iv) la marque, le modèle et le type de l'arme à feu et, s'il y a lieu, son numéro de série;

c) l'entreprise est tenue de transmettre, à moins d'instructions contraires du contrôleur des armes à feu, tout registre ou fichier contenant les renseignements visés aux alinéas a) ou b) à la personne désignée par règlement s'il est déterminé que l'entreprise cessera d'en être une.

Destruction of records

(2) The prescribed official may destroy the records transmitted to them under paragraph (1)(c) at the times and in the circumstances that may be prescribed.

Destruction des registres et fichiers

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 8

2015, c. 27, s. 13(1).

8 Subsection 61(3.1) of the Act is replaced by the following:

2015, ch. 27, par. 13(1).

8 Le paragraphe 61(3.1) de la même loi est remplacé par ce qui suit :

Automatic authorization to transport

(3.1) An authorization to transport referred to in subsection 19(1.1), (2.1), (2.2) or (2.3) must take the form of a condition attached to a licence.

Autorisation automatique de transport

(3.1) Les autorisations de transport visées aux paragraphes 19(1.1), (2.1), (2.2) ou (2.3) prennent la forme d'une condition d'un permis.

9 Paragraph 70(1)(a) of the Act is amended by adding the following after subparagraph (i):

(i.1) transfers, as defined in section 21, a non-restricted firearm other than in accordance with section 23,

9 L'alinéa 70(1)a) de la même loi est remplacé par ce qui suit :

a) le titulaire soit ne peut plus ou n'a jamais pu être titulaire du permis ou de l'autorisation, soit cède, au sens de l'article 21, une arme à feu sans restriction autrement que conformément à l'article 23, soit enfreint une condition du permis ou de l'autorisation, soit encore a été déclaré coupable ou absous en application de l'article 730 du Code criminel d'une infraction visée à l'alinéa 5(2)a);

— 2019, c. 9, s. 10

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 10

10 (1) The portion of subsection 85(1) of the French version of the Act before subparagraph (a)(i) is replaced by the following:

Autres registres du directeur

85 (1) Le directeur établit un registre :

a) des armes à feu acquises ou détenues par les personnes précisées ci-après et utilisées par celles-ci dans le cadre de leurs fonctions :

10 (1) Le passage du paragraphe 85(1) de la version française de la même loi précédant le sous-alinéa a)(i) est remplacé par ce qui suit :

Autres registres du directeur

85 (1) Le directeur établit un registre :

a) des armes à feu acquises ou détenues par les personnes précisées ci-après et utilisées par celles-ci dans le cadre de leurs fonctions :

(2) Paragraph 85(1)(b) of the French version of the Act is replaced by the following:

(2) L'alinéa 85(1)b) de la version française de la même loi est remplacé par ce qui suit :

b) des armes à feu acquises ou détenues par des particuliers sous les ordres et pour le compte des forces policières ou d'un ministère fédéral ou provincial;

(3) Subsection 85(1) of the Act is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (a) and by adding the following after paragraph (b):

(c) every request for a reference number made to the Registrar under section 23 and, if the request is refused, the reasons for refusing the request; and

(d) every reference number that is issued by the Registrar under subsection 23(3) and, with respect to each reference number, the day on which it was issued and the licence numbers of the transferor and transferee.

(4) Subsection 85(2) of the Act is replaced by the following:

Reporting of acquisitions and transfers

(2) A person referred to in paragraph (1)(a) or (b) who acquires or transfers a firearm shall have the Registrar informed of the acquisition or transfer.

— 2019, c. 9, s. 11

2012, c. 6, s. 25.

11 Section 90.1 of the Act is repealed.

— 2019, c. 9, s. 13

13 (1) Section 117 of the Act is amended by adding the following after paragraph (c):

(c.1) regulating, for the purpose of issuing a reference number under section 23, the provision of information by a transferor, a transferee and the Registrar;

(2) [In force]

(3) Section 117 of the Act is amended by adding the following after paragraph (n):

(n.1) regulating the transmission of records under paragraph 58.1(1)(c) by a business to a prescribed official;

— 2019, c. 9, s. 14

14 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 126:

Licence of business — deemed conditions

126.1 Every licence of a business that is valid on the commencement day is deemed to include the conditions set out in paragraphs 58.1(1)(a) to (c).

b) des armes à feu acquises ou détenues par des particuliers sous les ordres et pour le compte des forces policières ou d'un ministère fédéral ou provincial;

(3) Le paragraphe 85(1) de la même loi est modifié par adjonction, après l'alinéa b), de ce qui suit :

c) des demandes d'attribution de numéro de référence que reçoit le directeur au titre de l'article 23 et, si la demande est refusée, les raisons du refus;

d) des numéros de référence attribués par le directeur au titre du paragraphe 23(3) et, à l'égard de chaque numéro de référence attribué, la date à laquelle le numéro de référence a été attribué et les numéros de permis du cédant et du cessionnaire.

(4) Le paragraphe 85(2) de la même loi est remplacé par ce qui suit :

Signalement des acquisitions ou cessions

(2) Toute personne visée aux alinéas (1)a) ou b) fait notifier au directeur toute acquisition ou tout transfert d'armes à feu qu'elle effectue.

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 11

2012, ch. 6, art. 25.

11 L'article 90.1 de la même loi est abrogé.

— 2019, ch. 9, par. 13(1) et (3)

13 (1) L'article 117 de la même loi est modifié par adjonction, après l'alinéa c), de ce qui suit :

c.1) régir, aux fins de l'attribution d'un numéro de référence au titre de l'article 23, la fourniture des renseignements par le cédant, le cessionnaire et le directeur;

(2) [En vigueur]

(3) L'article 117 de la même loi est modifié par adjonction, après l'alinéa n), de ce qui suit :

n.1) régir la transmission de registres ou fichiers visés à l'alinéa 58.1(1)c) par une entreprise à une personne désignée par règlement;

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 14

14 La même loi est modifiée par adjonction, après l'article 126, de ce qui suit :

Permis délivrés aux entreprises : conditions réputées

126.1 Les permis délivrés aux entreprises qui sont valides à la date de référence sont réputés être assortis des conditions visées aux alinéas 58.1(1)a) à c).

— 2019, c. 9, s. 15

15 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 135:

Revocation of authorization to transport

135.1 All of the following authorizations to transport a prohibited firearm or a restricted firearm are revoked:

(a) authorizations issued under any of paragraphs 19(2.1)(b) to (e), as those paragraphs read immediately before the commencement day; and

(b) authorizations issued under paragraph 19(2.2)(b), as that paragraph read immediately before the commencement day, in respect of transportation to and from the places referred to in any of the paragraphs that are set out in paragraph (a).

— 2019, ch. 9, art. 15

15 La même loi est modifiée par adjonction, après l'article 135, de ce qui suit :

Révocation de l'autorisation de transport

135.1 Toute autorisation de transport d'armes à feu prohibées ou d'armes à feu à autorisation restreinte est révoquée dans les cas suivants :

a) elle a été délivrée en application de l'un ou l'autre des alinéas 19(2.1)b) à e), dans leur version antérieure à la date de référence;

b) elle a été délivrée en application de l'alinéa 19(2.2)b), dans sa version antérieure à la date de référence, à l'égard du transport vers les lieux visés à l'un ou l'autre des alinéas visés à l'alinéa a) et à partir de ceux-ci.

Evidence --- Opinion — Experts — Qualification of expert — Miscellaneous

Shareholders brought professional negligence action against former auditors — Shareholders had retained different accounting firm which they claimed revealed problems with auditors' work — Auditors brought motion for summary judgment to have action dismissed — Shareholders retained forensic accounting partner from accounting firm to prepare report — Her affidavit set out opinion that auditors did not comply with professional obligations — Auditors applied successfully to strike out affidavit on grounds that affiant was not impartial witness — Majority of Court of Appeal concluded that motions judge erred in excluding affidavit — Auditors appealed — Appeal dismissed — Concerns related to expert's duty to court and willingness and capacity to comply with it are best addressed initially in "qualified expert" element of framework from case law — Proposed expert witness who is unable or unwilling to fulfill this duty to court is not properly qualified to perform role of expert — Situating this concern in "properly qualified expert" ensures courts will focus expressly on important risks associated with biased experts — If expert evidence is found to meet basic threshold, judge must still take concerns about expert's independence and impartiality into account in weighing evidence at gatekeeping stage — Relevance, necessity, reliability and absence of bias can helpfully be seen as part of sliding scale where basic level must first be achieved in order to meet admissibility threshold and thereafter continue to play role in weighing overall competing considerations in admitting evidence — Potential helpfulness of evidence must not be outweighed by risk of dangers materializing that are associated with expert evidence — Record in this case amply sustained result reached by majority of Court of Appeal that affiant's evidence was admissible on summary judgment application.

Civil practice and procedure --- Summary judgment — Evidence on application — Affidavit evidence — Based on information and belief

Shareholders brought professional negligence action against former auditors — Shareholders had retained different accounting firm which they claimed revealed problems with auditors' work — Auditors brought motion for summary judgment to have action dismissed — Shareholders retained forensic accounting partner from accounting firm to prepare report — Her affidavit set out opinion that auditors did not comply with professional obligations — Auditors applied successfully to strike out affidavit on grounds that affiant was not impartial witness — Majority of Court of Appeal concluded that motions judge erred in excluding affidavit — Auditors appealed — Appeal dismissed — Motions judge hearing summary judgment application under Nova Scotia rules must be satisfied that proposed expert evidence meets threshold requirements for admissibility at first step of analysis, but generally should not engage in second step cost-benefit analysis — That cost-benefit analysis, in anything other than most obvious cases of inadmissibility, inevitably involves assigning weight or potential weight to evidence — Record in this case amply sustained result reached by majority of Court of Appeal that affiant's evidence was admissible on summary judgment application — There was no finding by motions judge that affiant was in fact biased or not impartial or that she was acting as advocate — To the extent motion judge was concerned about "appearance" of impartiality, this factor played no part in test for admissibility — There was agreement with majority of Court of Appeal that motions judge committed palpable and overriding error in determining that affiant was in conflict of interest that prevented her from giving impartial and objective evidence.

Preuve --- Opinion — Experts — Rapports d'expert — Recevabilité

Actionnaires ont intenté une action pour négligence professionnelle contre les anciens vérificateurs de leur compagnie — Actionnaires avaient engagé un autre cabinet comptable qui, selon eux, a révélé des erreurs par les vérificateurs précédents — Vérificateurs ont présenté une requête en jugement sommaire visant à faire rejeter l'action — Actionnaires ont fait appel à une associée en juricomptabilité du cabinet pour qu'elle rédige un rapport — Son affidavit exposait ses constatations que les vérificateurs ne se sont pas acquittés de leurs obligations professionnelles — Vérificateurs ont présenté avec succès une requête en radiation de l'affidavit au motif que l'associée en question n'était pas un témoin expert impartial — Juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont conclu que le juge des requêtes avait eu tort d'exclure l'affidavit — Vérificateurs ont formé un pourvoi — Pourvoi rejeté — Manque d'indépendance et d'impartialité d'un expert joue au regard tant de l'admissibilité de son témoignage que de la valeur du témoignage, s'il est admis — Obligation du témoin expert est d'être juste, objectif et impartial — En l'absence d'une contestation concernant l'indépendance et l'impartialité de l'expert, le critère est généralement satisfait dès lors que l'expert, dans son attestation ou sa déposition, reconnaît son obligation et l'accepte — Il incombe alors à la partie qui s'oppose à l'admission du témoignage de l'expert de démontrer un motif réaliste de le juger inadmissible au motif que l'expert ne peut ou ne veut s'acquitter de son obligation — Si elle réussit, la charge de démontrer, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, qu'il a été satisfait à ce critère d'admissibilité incombe toujours à la partie qui entend présenter le témoignage — Dossier en l'espèce appuyait largement la conclusion à laquelle est parvenue la majorité de la Cour d'appel que le témoignage contenu dans l'affidavit était admissible pour l'instruction de la requête en jugement sommaire.

Procédure civile --- Jugement sommaire — Preuve en instance — Preuve par affidavit — Fondé sur des renseignements et sur une opinion

Actionnaires ont intenté une action pour négligence professionnelle contre les anciens vérificateurs de leur compagnie — Actionnaires avaient engagé un autre cabinet comptable qui, selon eux, a révélé des erreurs par les vérificateurs précédents — Vérificateurs ont présenté une requête en jugement sommaire visant à faire rejeter l'action — Actionnaires ont fait appel à une associée en juricomptabilité du cabinet pour qu'elle rédige un rapport — Son affidavit exposait ses constatations que les vérificateurs ne se sont pas acquittés de leurs obligations professionnelles — Vérificateurs ont présenté avec succès une requête en radiation de l'affidavit au motif que l'associée en question n'était pas un témoin expert impartial — Juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont conclu que le juge des requêtes avait eu tort d'exclure l'affidavit — Vérificateurs ont formé un pourvoi — Pourvoi rejeté — Juge saisi d'une requête en jugement sommaire en vertu des règles de procédure de la Nouvelle-Écosse doit être convaincu que le témoignage de l'expert proposé satisfait aux critères d'admissibilité à la première étape de l'analyse; en règle générale, il doit toutefois se garder de passer à la seconde étape, celle de l'analyse coût-bénéfices — Cette analyse, sauf dans les cas d'inadmissibilité les plus manifestes, appelle inévitablement l'attribution d'une valeur, ou, à tout le moins, d'une valeur possible, à la preuve — Dossier en l'espèce appuyait largement la conclusion à laquelle est parvenue la majorité de la Cour d'appel que le témoignage contenu dans l'affidavit était admissible pour l'instruction de la requête en jugement sommaire — Juge des requêtes n'a pas conclu que le témoin avait un parti pris, qu'il n'était pas impartial ou qu'il se faisait le défenseur des actionnaires — Même si, selon le juge des requêtes, il fallait une « apparence » d'impartialité, ce facteur ne constituait pas un critère d'admissibilité — On s'entendait avec les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel que le juge des requêtes a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en concluant que le témoin était dans une situation de conflit d'intérêts qui l'empêchait de rendre un témoignage objectif et impartial.

Shareholders brought a professional negligence action against the former auditors of their company. The shareholders started the action after retaining a different accounting firm to perform various accounting tasks and which they claimed revealed problems with the auditors' work. The auditors brought a motion for summary judgment to have the action dismissed. The shareholders retained a forensic accounting partner from the accounting firm to review materials and to prepare a report. Her affidavit set out her opinion that the auditors had not complied with their professional obligations. The auditors applied to strike out her affidavit on the grounds that she was not an impartial witness. The motions judge essentially agreed and struck out the affidavit. The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the motions judge erred in excluding the affidavit. The auditors appealed.

Held: The appeal was dismissed.

Per Cromwell J. (McLachlin C.J.C. and Abella, Rothstein, Moldaver, Wagner and Gascon JJ. concurring): Following the dominant view of Canadian cases, an expert's lack of independence and impartiality goes to the admissibility of evidence in addition to being considered in relation to the weight to be given to the evidence if admitted. Such an approach is more in line with the basic structure of the law relating to expert evidence and with the importance jurisprudence has attached to the gatekeeping role of trial judges.

The duty owed by an expert witness is that the expert must be fair, objective and non-partisan. The appropriate threshold flows from this duty. Absent challenge to the expert's independence and impartiality, the expert's attestation or testimony recognizing and accepting the duty will generally be sufficient to establish that the threshold is met. The burden is then on the party opposing the admission of the evidence to show that there is realistic concern that the expert's evidence should not be received because the expert is unable and/or unwilling to comply with that duty. If the opponent does so, the burden to establish on a balance of probabilities this aspect of the admissibility threshold remains on the party proposing to call the evidence. Exclusion at the threshold stage of the analysis should occur only in very clear cases in which the proposed expert is unable or unwilling to provide fair, objective and non-partisan evidence. Anything less should not lead to exclusion, but be taken into account in the overall weighing of costs and benefits of receiving the evidence. The concept of apparent bias is not relevant to the question of whether an expert witness will be unable or unwilling to fulfill its primary duty to the court.

Concerns related to the expert's duty to the court and willingness and capacity to comply with it are best addressed initially in the "qualified expert" element of the framework from case law. A proposed expert witness who is unable or unwilling to fulfill this duty to the court is not properly qualified to perform the role of expert. Situating this concern in the "properly qualified expert" ensures courts will focus expressly on the important risks associated with biased experts. If the expert evidence is found to meet the basic threshold, the judge must still take concerns about the expert's independence and impartiality into account in weighing the evidence at the gatekeeping stage. Relevance, necessity, reliability and absence of bias can helpfully be seen as part of a sliding scale where a basic level must first be achieved in order to meet the admissibility threshold and thereafter continue to play role in weighing the overall competing considerations in admitting the evidence. The potential helpfulness of the evidence must not be outweighed by the risk of the dangers materializing that are associated with expert evidence.

A motions judge hearing a summary judgment application under the Nova Scotia rules must be satisfied that proposed expert evidence meets the threshold requirements for admissibility at the first step of the analysis, but generally should not engage in the second step cost-benefit analysis. That cost-benefit analysis, in anything other than the most obvious cases of inadmissibility, inevitably involves assigning weight or potential weight to the evidence.

The record amply sustained the result reached by the majority of the Court of Appeal that the affiant's evidence was admissible on the summary judgment application. There was no finding by the motions judge that the affiant was in fact biased or not impartial or that she was acting as an advocate. The motions judge recognized that the affiant was aware of the standards and requirements that experts be independent. The affiant testified that she owed an ultimate duty to the court in testifying as an expert witness. To the extent the motions judge was concerned about the "appearance" of impartiality, this factor played no part in the test for admissibility. The fact that one professional firm discovered what it thought was or may be professional negligence did not disqualify it from offering that opinion as an expert witness. There was no more than a speculative possibility of the accounting firm incurring liability if its opinion was not ultimately accepted by the court. An expert does not lack the threshold qualification in relation to the duty to give fair, objective and non-partisan evidence simply because the expert relies on the work of other professions in reaching his or her own opinion. There was agreement with the majority of the Court of Appeal that the motions judge committed a palpable and overriding error in determining that the affiant was in a conflict of interest that prevented her from giving impartial and objective evidence.

Les actionnaires ont intenté une action pour négligence professionnelle contre les anciens vérificateurs de leur compagnie. Les actionnaires ont intenté l'action après avoir engagé un autre cabinet comptable pour effectuer diverses tâches comptables, qui, selon eux, avaient révélé des erreurs par les vérificateurs précédents. Les vérificateurs ont présenté une requête en jugement sommaire visant à faire rejeter l'action. Les actionnaires ont fait appel à une associée en juricomptabilité du cabinet pour qu'elle examine tous les documents pertinents et rédige un rapport. Son affidavit exposait ses constatations que les vérificateurs ne se sont pas acquittés de leurs obligations professionnelles. Les vérificateurs ont présenté une requête en radiation de l'affidavit au motif que l'associée en question n'était pas un témoin expert impartial. Le juge des requêtes s'est dit d'accord avec les vérificateurs pour l'essentiel et a radié l'affidavit. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont conclu que le juge des requêtes avait eu tort d'exclure l'affidavit et ont accueilli l'appel. Les vérificateurs ont formé un pourvoi.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi a été rejeté.

Cromwell, J. (McLachlin, J.C.C., Abella, Rothstein, Moldaver, Wagner, Gascon, JJ., souscrivant à son opinion) : Conformément au courant prédominant dans la jurisprudence canadienne, le manque d'indépendance et d'impartialité d'un expert joue au regard tant de l'admissibilité de son témoignage que de la valeur du témoignage, s'il est admis. Cette façon de voir semble s'accorder davantage avec l'économie générale du droit en ce qui concerne les témoignages d'experts et l'importance que la jurisprudence accorde au rôle de gardien exercé par les juges de première instance.

L'obligation du témoin expert est d'être juste, objectif et impartial. Le critère d'admissibilité découle de cette obligation. En l'absence d'une contestation concernant l'indépendance et l'impartialité de l'expert, le critère est généralement satisfait dès lors que l'expert, dans son attestation ou sa déposition, reconnaît son obligation et l'accepte. Il incombe alors à la partie qui s'oppose à l'admission du témoignage de l'expert de démontrer un motif réaliste de le juger inadmissible au motif que l'expert ne peut ou ne veut s'acquitter de son obligation. Si elle réussit, la charge de démontrer, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, qu'il a été satisfait à ce critère d'admissibilité incombe toujours à la partie qui entend présenter le témoignage. La décision d'exclure le témoignage à la première étape de l'analyse pour non-conformité aux critères d'admissibilité ne devrait être prise que dans les cas manifestes où l'expert proposé ne peut ou ne veut fournir une preuve juste, objective et impartiale. Dans les autres cas, le témoignage ne devrait pas être exclu d'office, et son admissibilité devrait être déterminée à l'issue d'une pondération globale du coût et des bénéfices de son admission. La notion d'apparence de parti pris n'est pas pertinente lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si le témoin expert pourra ou voudra s'acquitter de sa principale obligation envers le tribunal.

C'est sous le volet « qualification suffisante de l'expert » du cadre établi par la jurisprudence qu'il convient d'abord d'examiner les préoccupations concernant l'obligation de l'expert envers le tribunal et s'il peut ou veut s'en acquitter. Le témoin expert proposé qui ne peut ou ne veut s'acquitter de cette obligation envers le tribunal ne possède pas la qualification suffisante pour exercer ce rôle. En abordant cette préoccupation sous le volet de la « qualification suffisante de l'expert », les tribunaux pourront s'attacher à évaluer les risques importants que présentent les experts qui ont un parti pris. Si le témoignage de l'expert satisfait aux critères, le juge doit malgré tout tenir compte des réserves émises quant à l'indépendance et à l'impartialité de l'expert lorsqu'il évalue la preuve à l'étape où il exerce son rôle de gardien. Il peut être utile de concevoir la pertinence, la nécessité, la fiabilité et l'absence de parti pris comme autant d'éléments d'un examen en deux temps, qui entrent en ligne de compte à la première étape, celle qui sert à déterminer s'il est satisfait aux critères d'admissibilité, et jouent également un rôle à la deuxième, dans la pondération des considérations concurrentes globales relatives à l'admissibilité. Au bout du compte, le juge doit être convaincu que les risques liés au témoignage de l'expert ne l'emportent pas sur l'utilité possible de celui-ci.

Le juge saisi d'une requête en jugement sommaire en vertu des règles de procédure de la Nouvelle-Écosse doit être convaincu que le témoignage de l'expert proposé satisfait aux critères d'admissibilité à la première étape de l'analyse; en règle générale, il doit toutefois se garder de passer à la seconde étape, celle de l'analyse coût-bénéfices. Cette analyse, sauf dans les cas d'inadmissibilité les plus manifestes, appelle inévitablement l'attribution d'une valeur, ou, à tout le moins, d'une valeur possible, à la preuve.
Le dossier en l'espèce appuyait largement la conclusion à laquelle est parvenue la majorité de la Cour d'appel que le témoignage contenu dans l'affidavit était admissible pour l'instruction de la requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge des requêtes n'a pas conclu que le témoin avait un parti pris, qu'il n'était pas impartial ou qu'il se faisait le défenseur des actionnaires. Le juge des requêtes a reconnu que le témoin connaissait les normes et exigences voulant que l'expert soit indépendant. Le témoin était conscient à titre de témoin expert de sa principale obligation envers le tribunal. Même si, selon le juge des requêtes, il fallait une « apparence » d'impartialité, ce facteur ne constituait pas un critère d'admissibilité. Le cabinet professionnel qui découvre ce qu'il estime être une négligence professionnelle ou ce qui pourrait l'être n'est pas d'emblée interdit de donner son opinion en tant que témoin expert. Il n'y avait rien de plus qu'une hypothétique possibilité que le cabinet soit tenu responsable si, en fin de compte, le tribunal n'avait pas retenu son opinion. Un expert ne satisfait pas au critère de la qualification suffisante, dans la mesure où il est question de son obligation de rendre un témoignage juste, objectif et impartial, simplement parce qu'il se fonde sur le travail d'autres professionnels pour se faire une opinion. On s'entendait avec les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel que le juge des requêtes a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en concluant que le témoin était dans une situation de conflit d'intérêts qui l'empêchait de rendre un témoignage objectif et impartial.

Words and phrases considered:

Expert witnesses have a special duty to the court to provide fair, objective and non-partisan assistance.

Underlying the various formulations of the duty are three related concepts: impartiality, independence and absence of bias. The expert's opinion must be impartial in the sense that it reflects an objective assessment of the questions at hand. It must be independent in the sense that it is the product of the expert's independent judgment, uninfluenced by who has retained him or her or the outcome of the litigation. It must be unbiased in the sense that it does not unfairly favour one party's position over another. The acid test is whether the expert's opinion would not change regardless of which party retained him or her: P. Michell and R. Mandhane, "The Uncertain Duty of the Expert Witness" (2005), 42 Alta. L. Rev. 635, at pp. 638- 39.

Termes et locutions cités:

impartialité

Le témoin expert a l'obligation particulière d'apporter au tribunal une aide juste, objective et impartiale.

(....)

Trois concepts apparentés sont à la base des diverses définitions de l'obligation de l'expert, à savoir l'impartialité, l'indépendance et l'absence de parti pris. L'opinion de l'expert doit être impartiale, en ce sens qu'elle découle d'un examen objectif des questions à trancher. Elle doit être indépendante, c'est-à-dire qu'elle doit être le fruit du jugement indépendant de l'expert, non influencée par la partie pour qui il témoigne ou l'issue du litige. Elle doit être exempte de parti pris, en ce sens qu'elle ne doit pas favoriser injustement la position d'une partie au détriment de celle de l'autre. Le critère décisif est que l'opinion de l'expert ne changerait pas, peu importe la partie qui aurait retenu ses services (P. Michell et R. Mandhane, « The Uncertain Duty of the Expert Witness » (2005) 42 Alta. L. Rev. 635, p. 638-639).

Comment

White Burgess Langille Inman v. Abbott and Haliburton Co. comprehensively restates the law on admissibility of expert evidence in civil and criminal cases. A unanimous Supreme Court adopts the key feature of the judgment of Doherty J. in R. v. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624, 68 C.R. (6th) 201 (Ont. C.A.) by holding that the admissibility analysis has two stages — a set of threshold preconditions to admissibility and a discretionary gatekeeper stage (see para. 22, adopting Abbey). The Court also resolves a longstanding question in the Canadian case law by holding that defects in an expert witness's independence and impartiality can go to admissibility and not only to weight (para. 45). In fact, on examination, the Court's analysis indicates that problems of independence and impartiality may properly be considered at three separate stages in the analysis of expert evidence. First, the question whether proposed expert witnesses are able and willing to comply with their duties to the court can be addressed at the threshold stage of the admissibility analysis under the "qualified expert" requirement (para. 53). Second, even when the expert is qualified, questions about independence and impartiality can be taken into account at the gatekeeper stage (para. 54). But this too is a question of admissibility to be considered by the trier of law. What may be obscured by the Court's emphasis on admissibility is the third stage when these concerns enter the analysis: independence and impartiality can also be considered by the trier of fact where the evidence is admitted (para. 45).

Given that White Burgess Langille Inman will become the starting point for argument on the admissibility of expert evidence, it is somewhat disappointing that the Court did not provide an easily accessible summary of the admissibility analysis. Instead, one must carefully read through the judgment to piece together the features of the admissibility framework. One might attempt to summarize that framework as follows:

Expert evidence is admissible when

1) it meets the threshold requirements of admissibility, which are that

a. the evidence must be logically relevant;

b. the evidence must be necessary to assist the trier of fact;

c. there must be no other exclusionary rule;

d. the expert must be properly qualified, which includes the requirement that the expert be willing and able to fulfil the duty to the court to provide evidence that is

i. impartial,

ii. independent and

iii. unbiased; and

e. for opinions based on novel or contested science or science used for a novel purpose, the underlying science must be reliable for that purpose;

and

2) it passes scrutiny at the gatekeeper stage, and the trial judge determines that the benefits of admitting the evidence outweigh its potential risks, considering such factors as

a. relevance,

b. necessity,

c. reliability, and

d. absence of bias (see para. 54).

Certain features of this framework will require clarification and amplification in the future. For example, the Court's reference to reliability as a threshold requirement "in the case of an opinion based on novel or contested science or science used for a novel purpose" (para. 23) leaves open the status of the reliability tests for non-scientific evidence that were extensively discussed in Abbey. While some questions remain, the framework outlined in White Burgess Langille Inman renews and clarifies the structure of the admissibility analysis for expert evidence.

I. Introduction and Issues

1 Expert opinion evidence can be a key element in the search for truth, but it may also pose special dangers. To guard against them, the Court over the last 20 years or so has progressively tightened the rules of admissibility and enhanced the trial judge's gatekeeping role. These developments seek to ensure that expert opinion evidence meets certain basic standards before it is admitted. The question on this appeal is whether one of these basic standards for admissibility should relate to the proposed expert's independence and impartiality. In my view, it should.

2 Expert witnesses have a special duty to the court to provide fair, objective and non-partisan assistance. A proposed expert witness who is unable or unwilling to comply with this duty is not qualified to give expert opinion evidence and should not be permitted to do so. Less fundamental concerns about an expert's independence and impartiality should be taken into account in the broader, overall weighing of the costs and benefits of receiving the evidence.

3 Applying these principles, I agree with the conclusion reached by the majority of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal and would therefore dismiss this appeal with costs.

II. Overview of the Facts and Judicial History

A. Facts and Proceedings

4 The appeal arises out of a professional negligence action by the respondents (who I will call the shareholders) against the appellants, the former auditors of their company (I will refer to them as the auditors). The shareholders started the action after they had retained a different accounting firm, the Kentville office of Grant Thornton LLP, to perform various accounting tasks and which in their view revealed problems with the auditors' previous work. The central allegation in the action is that the auditors' failure to apply generally accepted auditing and accounting standards while carrying out their functions caused financial loss to the shareholders. The main question in the action boils down to whether the auditors were negligent in the performance of their professional duties.

5 The auditors brought a motion for summary judgment in August of 2010, seeking to have the shareholders' action dismissed. In response, the shareholders retained Susan MacMillan, a forensic accounting partner at the Halifax office of Grant Thornton, to review all the relevant materials, including the documents filed in the action and to prepare a report of her findings. Her affidavit set out her findings, including her opinion that the auditors had not complied with their professional obligations to the shareholders. The auditors applied to strike out Ms. MacMillan's affidavit on the grounds that she was not an impartial expert witness. They argued that the action comes down to a battle of opinion between two accounting firms — the auditors' and the expert witness's. Ms. MacMillan's firm could be exposed to liability if its approach was not accepted by the court and, as a partner, Ms. MacMillan could be personally liable. Her potential liability if her opinion were not accepted gives her a personal financial interest in the outcome of the litigations and this, in the auditors' submission, ought to disqualify her from testifying.

6 The proceedings since have been neither summary nor resulted in a judgment. Instead, the litigation has been focused on the expert evidence issue; the summary judgment application has not yet been heard on its merits.

B. Judgments Below

(1) Nova Scotia Supreme Court: 2012 NSSC 210, 317 N.S.R. (2d) 283 (N.S. S.C.) (Pickup J.)

7 Pickup J. essentially agreed with the auditors and struck out the MacMillan affidavit in its entirety: at para. 106. He found that, in order to be admissible, an expert's evidence "must be, and be seen to be, independent and impartial": para. 99. Applying that test, he concluded that this was one of those "clearest of cases where the reliability of the expert ... does not meet the threshold requirements for admissibility": para. 101.

(2) Nova Scotia Court of Appeal: 2013 NSCA 66, 330 N.S.R. (2d) 301 (N.S. C.A.) (Beveridge J.A., Oland J.A. Concurring; MacDonald C.J.N.S., Dissenting)

8 The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the motions judge erred in excluding Ms. MacMillan's affidavit. Beveridge J.A. wrote that while the court has a discretion to exclude expert evidence due to actual bias or partiality, the test adopted by the motions judge — that an expert "must be, and be seen to be, independent and impartial" — was wrong in law. He ought not to have ruled her evidence inadmissible and struck out her affidavit.

9 MacDonald C.J.N.S., dissenting, would have upheld the motions judge's decision because he had properly articulated and applied the relevant legal principles.

III. Analysis

A. Overview

10 In my view, expert witnesses have a duty to the court to give fair, objective and non-partisan opinion evidence. They must be aware of this duty and able and willing to carry it out. If they do not meet this threshold requirement, their evidence should not be admitted. Once this threshold is met, however, concerns about an expert witness's independence or impartiality should be considered as part of the overall weighing of the costs and benefits of admitting the evidence. This common law approach is, of course, subject to statutory and related provisions which may establish different rules of admissibility.

B. Expert Witness Independence and Impartiality

11 There have been long-standing concerns about whether expert witnesses hired by the parties are impartial in the sense that they are expressing their own unbiased professional opinion and whether they are independent in the sense that their opinion is the product of their own, independent conclusions based on their own knowledge and judgment: see, e.g., G. R. Anderson, Expert Evidence (3rd ed. 2014), at p. 509; S. N. Lederman, A. W. Bryant and M. K. Fuerst, The Law of Evidence in Canada (4th ed. 2014), at p. 783. As Sir George Jessel, M.R., put it in the 1870s, "[u]ndoubtedly there is a natural bias to do something serviceable for those who employ you and adequately remunerate you. It is very natural, and it is so effectual, that we constantly see persons, instead of considering themselves witnesses, rather consider themselves as the paid agents of the person who employs them": Lord Abinger v. Ashton (1873), L.R. 17 Eq. 358 at 373 (Eng. Rolls Ct.), at p. 374.

12 Recent experience has only exacerbated these concerns; we are now all too aware that an expert's lack of independence and impartiality can result in egregious miscarriages of justice: R. v. D. (D.), 2000 SCC 43, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 275 (S.C.C.), at para. 52. As observed by Beveridge J.A. in this case, The Commission on Proceedings Involving Guy Paul Morin: Report (1998) authored by the Honourable Fred Kaufman and the Inquiry into Pediatric Forensic Pathology in Ontario: Report (2008) conducted by the Honourable Stephen T. Goudge provide two striking examples where "[s]eemingly solid and impartial, but flawed, forensic scientific opinion has played a prominent role in miscarriages of justice": para. 105. Other reports outline the critical need for impartial and independent expert evidence in civil litigation: ibid., at para. 106; see the Right Honourable Lord Woolf, Access to Justice: Final Report (1996); the Honourable Coulter A. Osborne, Civil Justice Reform Project: Summary of Findings & Recommendations (2007).

13 To decide how our law of evidence should best respond to these concerns, we must confront several questions: Should concerns about potentially biased expert opinion go to admissibility or only to weight?; If to admissibility, should these concerns be addressed by a threshold requirement for admissibility, by a judicial discretion to exclude, or both?; At what point do these concerns justify exclusion of the evidence?; And finally, how is our response to these concerns integrated into the existing legal framework governing the admissibility of expert opinion evidence? To answer these questions, we must first consider the existing legal framework governing admissibility, identify the duties that an expert witness has to the court and then turn to how those duties are best reflected in that legal framework.

C. The Legal Framework

(1) The Exclusionary Rule for Opinion Evidence

14 To the modern general rule that all relevant evidence is admissible there are many qualifications. One of them relates to opinion evidence, which is the subject of a complicated exclusionary rule. Witnesses are to testify as to the facts which they perceived, not as to the inferences — that is, the opinions — that they drew from them. As one great evidence scholar put it long ago, it is "for the jury to form opinions, and draw inferences and conclusions, and not for the witness": J. B. Thayer, A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law (1898; reprinted 1969), at p. 524; see also C. Tapper, Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th ed. 2010), at p. 530. While various rationales have been offered for this exclusionary rule, the most convincing is probably that these ready-formed inferences are not helpful to the trier of fact and might even be misleading: see, e.g., R. v. Graat, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 819 (S.C.C.), at p. 836; Halsbury's Laws of Canada: Evidence (2014 Reissue), at para. HEV-137 "General rule against opinion evidence".

15 Not all opinion evidence is excluded, however. Most relevant for this case is the exception for expert opinion evidence on matters requiring specialized knowledge. As Professor Tapper put it, "the law recognizes that, so far as matters calling for special knowledge or skill are concerned, judges and jurors are not necessarily equipped to draw true inferences from facts stated by witnesses. A witness is therefore allowed to state his opinion about such matters, provided he is expert in them": p. 530; see also R. v. Abbey, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 24 (S.C.C.), at p. 42.

(2) The Current Legal Framework for Expert Opinion Evidence

16 Since at least the mid-1990s, the Court has responded to a number of concerns about the impact on the litigation process of expert evidence of dubious value. The jurisprudence has clarified and tightened the threshold requirements for admissibility, added new requirements in order to assure reliability, particularly of novel scientific evidence, and emphasized the important role that judges should play as "gatekeepers" to screen out proposed evidence whose value does not justify the risk of confusion, time and expense that may result from its admission.

17 We can take as the starting point for these developments the Court's decision in R. v. Mohan, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 9 (S.C.C.). That case described the potential dangers of expert evidence and established a four-part threshold test for admissibility. The dangers are well known. One is that the trier of fact will inappropriately defer to the expert's opinion rather than carefully evaluate it. As Sopinka J. observed in Mohan:

> There is a danger that expert evidence will be misused and will distort the fact-finding process. Dressed up in scientific language which the jury does not easily understand and submitted through a witness of impressive antecedents, this evidence is apt to be accepted by the jury as being virtually infallible and as having more weight than it deserves. [p. 21]

18 The point is to preserve trial by judge and jury, not devolve to trial by expert. There is a risk that the jury "will be unable to make an effective and critical assessment of the evidence": R. v. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624, 97 O.R. (3d) 330 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 90, leave to appeal refused, [2010] 2 S.C.R. v (note) (S.C.C.). The trier of fact must be able to use its "informed judgment", not simply decide on the basis of an "act of faith" in the expert's opinion: J. (J.-L.), at para. 56. The risk of "attornment to the opinion of the expert" is also exacerbated by the fact that expert evidence is resistant to effective cross-examination by counsel who are not experts in that field: D. (D.), at para. 54. The cases address a number of other related concerns: the potential prejudice created by the expert's reliance on unproven material not subject to cross-examination (D. (D.), at para. 55); the risk of admitting "junk science" (J. (J.-L.), at para. 25); and the risk that a "contest of experts" distracts rather than assists the trier of fact (Mohan, at p. 24). Another well-known danger associated with the admissibility of expert evidence is that it may lead to an inordinate expenditure of time and money: Mohan, at p. 21; D.D., at para. 56; Masterpiece Inc. v. Alavida Lifestyles Inc., 2011 SCC 27, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 387 (S.C.C.), at para. 76.

19 To address these dangers, Mohan established a basic structure for the law relating to the admissibility of expert opinion evidence. That structure has two main components. First, there are four threshold requirements that the proponent of the evidence must establish in order for proposed expert opinion evidence to be admissible: (1) relevance; (2) necessity in assisting the trier of fact; (3) absence of an exclusionary rule; and (4) a properly qualified expert (Mohan, at pp. 20-25; see also Sekhon, at para. 43). Mohan also underlined the important role of trial judges in assessing whether otherwise admissible expert evidence should be excluded because its probative value was overborne by its prejudicial effect — a residual discretion to exclude evidence based on a cost-benefit analysis: p. 21. This is the second component, which the subsequent jurisprudence has further emphasized: Lederman, Bryant and Fuerst, at pp. 789-90; J. (J.-L.), at para. 28.

20 Mohan and the jurisprudence since, however, have not explicitly addressed how this "cost-benefit" component fits into the overall analysis. The reasons in Mohan engaged in a cost-benefit analysis with respect to particular elements of the four threshold requirements, but they also noted that the cost-benefit analysis could be an aspect of exercising the overall discretion to exclude evidence whose probative value does not justify its admission in light of its potentially prejudicial effects: p. 21. The jurisprudence since Mohan has also focused on particular aspects of expert opinion evidence, but again without always being explicit about where additional concerns fit into the analysis. The unmistakable overall trend of the jurisprudence, however, has been to tighten the admissibility requirements and to enhance the judge's gatekeeping role.

21 So, for example, the necessity threshold criterion was emphasized in cases such as D. (D.). The majority underlined that the necessity requirement exists "to ensure that the dangers associated with expert evidence are not lightly tolerated" and that

"[m]ere relevance or 'helpfulness' is not enough": para. 46. Other cases have addressed the reliability of the science underlying an opinion and indeed technical evidence in general: J. (J.-L.); R. v. Trochym, 2007 SCC 6, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 239 (S.C.C.). The question remains, however, as to where the cost-benefit analysis and concerns such as those about reliability fit into the overall analysis.

22 Abbey (ONCA) introduced helpful analytical clarity by dividing the inquiry into two steps. With minor adjustments, I would adopt that approach.

23 At the first step, the proponent of the evidence must establish the threshold requirements of admissibility. These are the four Mohan factors (relevance, necessity, absence of an exclusionary rule and a properly qualified expert) and in addition, in the case of an opinion based on novel or contested science or science used for a novel purpose, the reliability of the underlying science for that purpose: J. (J.-L.), at paras. 33, 35-36 and 47; Trochym, at para. 27; Lederman, Bryant and Fuerst, at pp. 788-89 and 800-801. Relevance at this threshold stage refers to logical relevance: Abbey (ONCA), at para. 82; J. (J.-L.), at para. 47. Evidence that does not meet these threshold requirements should be excluded. Note that I would retain necessity as a threshold requirement: D. (D.), at para. 57; see D. M. Paciocco and L. Stuesser, The Law of Evidence (7th ed. 2015), at pp. 209-10; R. v. Boswell, 2011 ONCA 283, 85 C.R. (6th) 290 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 13; R. v. C. (M.), 2014 ONCA 611, 13 C.R. (7th) 396 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 72.

24 At the second discretionary gatekeeping step, the judge balances the potential risks and benefits of admitting the evidence in order to decide whether the potential benefits justify the risks. The required balancing exercise has been described in various ways. In Mohan, Sopinka J. spoke of the "reliability versus effect factor" (p. 21), while in J. (J.-L.), Binnie J. spoke about "relevance, reliability and necessity" being "measured against the counterweights of consumption of time, prejudice and confusion": para 47. Doherty J.A. summed it up well in Abbey, stating that the "trial judge must decide whether expert evidence that meets the preconditions to admissibility is sufficiently beneficial to the trial process to warrant its admission despite the potential harm to the trial process that may flow from the admission of the expert evidence": para. 76.

25 With this delineation of the analytical framework, we can turn to the nature of an expert's duty to the court and where it fits into that framework.

D. The Expert's Duty to the Court or Tribunal

26 There is little controversy about the broad outlines of the expert witness's duty to the court. As Anderson writes, "[t]he duty to provide independent assistance to the Court by way of objective unbiased opinion has been stated many times by common law courts around the world": p. 227. I would add that a similar duty exists in the civil law of Quebec: J.-C. Royer and S. Lavallée, La preuve civile (4th ed. 2008), at para. 468; D. Béchard with the collaboration of J. Béchard, L'expert (2011) ch. 9; An Act to establish the new Code of Civil Procedure, S.Q. 2014, c. 1, art. 22 (not yet in force); L. Chamberland, Le nouveau Code de procédure civile commenté (2014), at pp. 14 and 121.

27 One influential statement of the elements of this duty are found in the English case National Justice Compania Naviera SA v. Prudential Assurance Co., [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 68 (Eng. Comm. Ct.). Following an 87-day trial, Cresswell J. believed that a misunderstanding of the duties and responsibilities of expert witnesses contributed to the length of the trial. He listed in obiter dictum duties and responsibilities of experts, the first two of which have particularly influenced the development of Canadian law:

> 1. Expert evidence presented to the Court should be, and should be seen to be, the independent product of the expert uninfluenced as to form or content by the exigencies of litigation ....
> 2. An expert witness should provide independent assistance to the Court by way of objective unbiased opinion in relation to matters within his [or her] expertise .... An expert witness in the High Court should never assume the role of an advocate.
>
> [Emphasis added; citation omitted; p. 81.]

(These duties were endorsed on appeal: ["Ikarian Reefer" (The), Re] [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 455 (Eng. C.A.), at p. 496.)

28 Many provinces and territories have provided explicit guidance related to the duty of expert witnesses. In Nova Scotia, for example, the Civil Procedure Rules require that an expert's report be signed by the expert who must make (among others) the following representations to the court: that the expert is providing an objective opinion for the assistance of the court; that the expert is prepared to apply independent judgment when assisting the court; and that the report includes everything the expert regards as relevant to the expressed opinion and draws attention to anything that could reasonably lead to a different conclusion (r. 55.04(1)(a), (b) and (c)). While these requirements do not affect the rules of evidence by which expert opinion is determined to be admissible or inadmissible, they provide a convenient summary of a fairly broadly shared sense of the duties of an expert witness to the court.

29 There are similar descriptions of the expert's duty in the civil procedure rules in other Canadian jurisdictions: Anderson, at p. 227; The Queen's Bench Rules (Saskatchewan), r. 5-37; Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, r. 11-2(1); Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 4.1.01(1); Rules of Court, Y.O.I.C. 2009/65, r. 34(23); An Act to establish the new Code of Civil Procedure, art. 22. Moreover, the rules in Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and the Federal Courts require experts to certify that they are aware of and will comply with their duty to the court: Anderson, at p. 228; Saskatchewan Queen's Bench Rules, r. 5-37(3); British Columbia Supreme Court Civil Rules, r. 11-2(2); Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure, r. 53.03(2.1); Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rules, r. 55.04(1)(a); Prince Edward Island Rules of Civil Procedure, r. 53.03(3)(g); An Act to establish the new Code of Civil Procedure, art. 235 (not yet in force); Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, r. 52.2(1)(c).

30 The formulation in the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure is perhaps the most succinct and complete statement of the expert's duty to the court: to provide opinion evidence that is fair, objective and non-partisan: r. 4.1.01(1)(a). The Rules are also explicit that this duty to the court prevails over any obligation owed by the expert to a party: r. 4.1.01(2). Likewise, the newly adopted Act to establish the new Code of Civil Procedure of Quebec explicitly provides, as a guiding principle, that the expert's duty to the court overrides the parties' interests, and that the expert must fulfill his or her primary duty to the court "objectively, impartially and thoroughly": art. 22; Chamberland, at pp. 14 and 121.

31 Many of the relevant rules of court simply reflect the duty that an expert witness owes to the court at common law: Anderson, at p. 227. In my opinion, this is true of the Nova Scotia rules that apply in this case. Of course, it is always open to each jurisdiction to impose different rules of admissibility, but in the absence of a clear indication to that effect, the common law rules apply in common law cases. I note that in Nova Scotia, the Civil Procedure Rules explicitly provide that they do not change the rules of evidence by which the admissibility of expert opinion evidence is determined: r. 55.01(2).

32 Underlying the various formulations of the duty are three related concepts: impartiality, independence and absence of bias. The expert's opinion must be impartial in the sense that it reflects an objective assessment of the questions at hand. It must be independent in the sense that it is the product of the expert's independent judgment, uninfluenced by who has retained him or her or the outcome of the litigation. It must be unbiased in the sense that it does not unfairly favour one party's position over another. The acid test is whether the expert's opinion would not change regardless of which party retained him or her: P. Michell and R. Mandhane, "The Uncertain Duty of the Expert Witness" (2005), 42 Alta. L. Rev. 635, at pp. 638-39. These concepts, of course, must be applied to the realities of adversary litigation. Experts are generally retained, instructed and paid by one of the adversaries. These facts alone do not undermine the expert's independence, impartiality and freedom from bias.

E. The Expert's Duties and Admissibility

33 As we have seen, there is a broad consensus about the nature of an expert's duty to the court. There is no such consensus, however, about how that duty relates to the admissibility of an expert's evidence. There are two main questions: Should the elements of this duty go to admissibility of the evidence rather than simply to its weight?; And, if so, is there a threshold admissibility requirement in relation to independence and impartiality?

34 In this section, I will explain my view that the answer to both questions is yes: a proposed expert's independence and impartiality goes to admissibility and not simply to weight and there is a threshold admissibility requirement in relation to this duty. Once that threshold is met, remaining concerns about the expert's compliance with his or her duty should be considered as part of the overall cost-benefit analysis which the judge conducts to carry out his or her gatekeeping role.

(1) Admissibility or Only Weight?

(a) The Canadian Law

35 The weight of authority strongly supports the conclusion that at a certain point, expert evidence should be ruled inadmissible due to the expert's lack of impartiality and/or independence.

36 Our Court has confirmed this position in a recent decision that was not available to the courts below:

> It is well established that an expert's opinion must be independent, impartial and objective, and given with a view to providing assistance to the decision maker (J.-C. Royer and S. Lavallée, La preuve civile (4th ed. 2008), at No. 468; D. Béchard, with J. Béchard, L'Expert (2011), chap. 9; An Act to establish the new Code of Civil Procedure, S.Q. 2014, c. 1, s. 22 (not yet in force)). However, these factors generally have an impact on the probative value of the expert's opinion and are not always insurmountable barriers to the admissibility of his or her testimony. Nor do they necessarily "disqualify" the expert (L. Ducharme and C.- M. Panaccio, L'administration de la preuve (4th ed. 2010), at Nos. 590-91 and 605). For expert testimony to be inadmissible, more than a simple appearance of bias is necessary. The question is not whether a reasonable person would consider that the expert is not independent. Rather, what must be determined is whether the expert's lack of independence renders him or her incapable of giving an impartial opinion in the specific circumstances of the case (D. M. Paciocco, "Unplugging Jukebox Testimony in an Adversarial System: Strategies for Changing the Tune on Partial Experts" (2009), 34 Queen's L.J. 565, at pp. 598-99).

> (Mouvement laïque québécois v. Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16, at para. 106)

37 I will refer to a number of other cases that support this view. I do so by way of illustration and without commenting on the outcome of particular cases. An expert's interest in the litigation or relationship to the parties has led to exclusion in a number of cases: see, e.g., Fellowes, McNeil v. Kansa General International Insurance Co. (1998), 40 O.R. (3d) 456 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (proposed expert was the defendant's lawyer in related matters and had investigated from the outset of his retainer the matter of a potential negligence claim against the plaintiff); CC&L Dedicated Enterprise Fund (Trustee of) v. Fisherman (2000), 49 O.R. (3d) 187 (Ont. S.C.J.) (expert was the party's lawyer in related U.S. proceedings); R. v. Docherty, 2010 ONSC 3628 (Ont. S.C.J.) (expert was the defence counsel's father); Ocean v. Economical Mutual Insurance Co., 2010 NSSC 315, 293 N.S.R. (2d) 394 (N.S. S.C.) (expert was also a party to the litigation); Handley v. Punnett, 2003 BCSC 294 (B.C. S.C.) (expert was also a party to the litigation); Bank of Montreal v. Citak, [2001] O.J. No. 1096 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) (expert was effectively a "co-venturer" in the case due in part to the fact that 40 percent of his remuneration was contingent upon success at trial: para. 7); Dean Construction Co. v. M.J. Dixon Construction Ltd., 2011 ONSC 4629, 5 C.L.R. (4th) 240 (Ont. Master) (expert's retainer agreement was inappropriate); Hutchingame v. Johnstone, 2006 BCSC 271 (B.C. S.C.) (expert stood to incur liability depending on the result of the trial). In other cases, the expert's stance or behaviour as an advocate has justified exclusion: see, e.g., Carmen Alfano Family Trust v. Piersanti, 2012 ONCA 297, 291 O.A.C. 62 (Ont. C.A.); Kirby Lowbed Services Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia, 2003 BCSC 617 (B.C. S.C.); Gould v. Western Coal Corp., 2012 ONSC 5184, 7 B.L.R. (5th) 19 (Ont. S.C.J.).

38 Many other cases have accepted, in principle, that lack of independence or impartiality can lead to exclusion, but have ruled that the expert evidence did not warrant rejection on the particular facts: see, e.g., United City Properties Ltd. v. Tong, 2010 BCSC 111 (B.C. S.C.); R. v. Inco Ltd. (2006), 80 O.R. (3d) 594 (Ont. S.C.J.). This was the position of the Court of Appeal in this case: para. 109; see also para. 121.

39 Some Canadian courts, however, have treated these matters as going exclusively to weight rather than to admissibility. The most often cited cases for this proposition are probably R. v. Klassen, 2003 MBQB 253, 179 Man. R. (2d) 115 (Man. Q.B.), and Gallant v. Brake-Patten, 2012 NLCA 23, 321 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 77 (N.L. C.A.). Klassen holds as admissible any expert evidence meeting the criteria from Mohan, with bias only becoming a factor as to the weight to be given to the evidence: see also R. v. Violette, 2008 BCSC 920 (B.C. S.C.). Similarly, the court in Gallant determined that a challenge to expert evidence that is based on the expert having a connection to a party or an issue in the case or a possible predetermined position on the case cannot take place at the admissibility stage: para. 89.

40 I conclude that the dominant approach in Canadian common law is to treat independence and impartiality as bearing not just on the weight but also on the admissibility of the evidence. I note that while the shareholders submit that issues regarding expert independence should go only to weight, they rely on cases such as INCO that specifically accept that a finding of lack of independence or impartiality can lead to inadmissibility in certain circumstances: R.F., at paras. 52-53.

(b) Other Jurisdictions

41 Outside Canada, the concerns related to independence and impartiality have been addressed in a number of ways. Some are similar to the approach in Canadian law.

42 For example, summarizing the applicable principles in British law, Nelson J. in Armchair Passenger Transport Ltd. v. Helical Bar Plc, [2003] EWHC 367 (Eng. & Wales H.C. [T. & C.C.]), underlined that when an expert has an interest or connection with the litigation or a party thereto, exclusion will be warranted if it is determined that the expert is unwilling or unable to carry out his or her primary duty to the court: see also H. M. Malek et al., eds., Phipson on Evidence (18th ed. 2013), at pp. 1158-59. The mere fact of an interest or connection will not disqualify, but it nonetheless may do so in light of the nature and extent of the interest or connection in particular circumstances. As Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers, M.R., put it in a leading case, "[i]t is always desirable that an expert should have no actual or apparent interest in the outcome of the proceedings in which he gives evidence, but such disinterest is not automatically a precondition to the admissibility of his evidence": Factortame Ltd. v. Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport & the Regions (Costs) (No.2) (2002), [2002] EWCA Civ 932, [2003] Q.B. 381 (Eng. C.A.), at para. 70; see also Gallaher International Ltd. v. Tlais Enterprises Ltd., [2007] EWHC 464 (Eng. Comm. Ct.); Meat Corp. of Namibia Ltd. v. Dawn Meats (U.K.) Ltd., [2011] EWHC 474 (Eng. Ch. Div.); Matchbet Ltd. v. Openbet Retail Ltd., [2013] EWHC 3067 (Eng. Ch. Div.), at paras. 312-17.

43 In Australia, the expert's objectivity and impartiality will generally go to weight, not to admissibility: I. Freckelton and H. Selby, Expert Evidence: Law, Practice, Procedure and Advocacy (5th ed. 2013), at p. 35. As the Court of Appeal of the state of Victoria put it: "... to the extent that it is desirable that expert witnesses should be under a duty to assist the Court, that has not been held and should not be held as disqualifying, in itself, an 'interested' witness from being competent to give expert evidence" (FGT Custodians Pty Ltd. v. Fagenblat, [2003] VSCA 33 (Australia Vic. Sup. Ct.), at para. 26 (AustLII); see also Freckelton and Selby, at pp. 186-88; Collins Thomson Ltd. v. Clayton, [2002] NSWSC 366 (New South Wales S.C.); Kirch Communications Pty Ltd. v. Gene Engineering Pty Ltd., [2002] NSWSC 485 (New South Wales S.C.); SmithKline Beecham (Australia) Pty Ltd. v. Chipman, [2003] FCA 796, 131 F.C.R. 200 (Australia Fed. Ct.)).

44 In the United States, at the federal level, the independence of the expert is a consideration that goes to the weight of the evidence, and a party may testify as an expert in his own case: Rodriguez v. Pacificare of Texas Inc. (1993), 980 F.2d 1014 (U.S. C.A. 5th Cir. 1993), at p. 1019; Tagatz v. Marquette University (1988), 861 F.2d 1040 (U.S. C.A. 7th Cir. 1988); Apple Inc. v. Motorola, Inc. (2014), 757 F.3d 1286 (U.S. C.A. Fed. Cir.), at p. 1321. This also seems to be a fair characterization of the situation in the states: Corpus Juris Secundum, vol. 32 (2008), at p. 325 ("The bias or interest of the witness does not affect his or her qualification, but only the weight to be given the testimony.").

(c) Conclusion

45 Following what I take to be the dominant view in the Canadian cases, I would hold that an expert's lack of independence and impartiality goes to the admissibility of the evidence in addition to being considered in relation to the weight to be given to the evidence if admitted. That approach seems to me to be more in line with the basic structure of our law relating to expert evidence and with the importance our jurisprudence has attached to the gatekeeping role of trial judges. Binnie J. summed up the Canadian approach well in J. (J.-L.): "The admissibility of the expert evidence should be scrutinized at the time it is proffered, and not allowed too easy an entry on the basis that all of the frailties could go at the end of the day to weight rather than admissibility" (para. 28).

(2) The Appropriate Threshold

46 I have already described the duty owed by an expert witness to the court: the expert must be fair, objective and non-partisan. As I see it, the appropriate threshold for admissibility flows from this duty. I agree with Prof. (now Justice of the Ontario Court of Justice) Paciocco that "the common law has come to accept ... that expert witnesses have a duty to assist the court that overrides their obligation to the party calling them. If a witness is unable or unwilling to fulfill that duty, they do not qualify to perform the role of an expert and should be excluded": "Taking a 'Goudge' out of Bluster and Blarney: an 'Evidence-Based Approach' to Expert Testimony" (2009), 13 Can. Crim. L. R. 135, at p. 152 (footnote omitted). The expert witnesses must, therefore, be aware of this primary duty to the court and able and willing to carry it out.

47 Imposing this additional threshold requirement is not intended to and should not result in trials becoming longer or more complex. As Prof. Paciocco aptly observed, "if inquiries about bias or partiality become routine during Mohan voir dires, trial testimony will become nothing more than an inefficient reprise of the admissibility hearing": "Unplugging Jukebox Testimony in an Adversarial System: Strategies for Changing the Tune on Partial Experts" (2009), 34 Queen's L.J. 565 ("Jukebox"), at p. 597. While I would not go so far as to hold that the expert's independence and impartiality should be presumed absent challenge, my view is that absent such challenge, the expert's attestation or testimony recognizing and accepting the duty will generally be sufficient to establish that this threshold is met.

48 Once the expert attests or testifies on oath to this effect, the burden is on the party opposing the admission of the evidence to show that there is a realistic concern that the expert's evidence should not be received because the expert is unable and/or unwilling to comply with that duty. If the opponent does so, the burden to establish on a balance of probabilities this aspect of the admissibility threshold remains on the party proposing to call the evidence. If this is not done, the evidence, or those parts of it that are tainted by a lack of independence or by impartiality, should be excluded. This approach conforms to the general rule under the Mohan framework, and elsewhere in the law of evidence, that the proponent of the evidence has the burden of establishing its admissibility.

49 This threshold requirement is not particularly onerous and it will likely be quite rare that a proposed expert's evidence would be ruled inadmissible for failing to meet it. The trial judge must determine, having regard to both the particular circumstances of the proposed expert and the substance of the proposed evidence, whether the expert is able and willing to carry out his or her primary duty to the court. For example, it is the nature and extent of the interest or connection with the litigation or a party thereto which matters, not the mere fact of the interest or connection; the existence of some interest or a relationship does not automatically render the evidence of the proposed expert inadmissible. In most cases, a mere employment relationship with the party calling the evidence will be insufficient to do so. On the other hand, a direct financial interest in the outcome of the litigation will be of more concern. The same can be said in the case of a very close familial relationship with one of the parties or situations in which the proposed expert will probably incur professional liability if his or her opinion is not accepted by the court. Similarly, an expert who, in his or her proposed evidence or otherwise, assumes the role of an advocate for a party is clearly unwilling and/or unable to carry out the primary duty to the court. I emphasize that exclusion at the threshold stage of the analysis should occur only in very clear cases in which the proposed expert is unable or unwilling to provide the court with fair, objective and non-partisan evidence. Anything less than clear unwillingness or inability to do so should not lead to exclusion, but be taken into account in the overall weighing of costs and benefits of receiving the evidence.

50 As discussed in the English case law, the decision as to whether an expert should be permitted to give evidence despite having an interest or connection with the litigation is a matter of fact and degree. The concept of apparent bias is not relevant to the question of whether or not an expert witness will be unable or unwilling to fulfill its primary duty to the court. When looking at an expert's interest or relationship with a party, the question is not whether a reasonable observer would think that the expert is not independent. The question is whether the relationship or interest results in the expert being unable or unwilling to carry out his or her primary duty to the court to provide fair, non-partisan and objective assistance.

51 Having established the analytical framework, described the expert's duty and determined that compliance with this duty goes to admissibility and not simply to weight, I turn now to where this duty fits into the analytical framework for admission of expert opinion evidence.

F. Situating the Analysis in the Mohan Framework

(1) The Threshold Inquiry

52 Courts have addressed independence and impartiality at various points of the admissibility test. Almost every branch of the Mohan framework has been adapted to incorporate bias concerns one way or another: the proper qualifications component (see, e.g., Bank of Montreal; Dean Construction; Agribrands Purina Canada Inc. v. Kasamekas, 2010 ONSC 166 (Ont. S.C.J.); R. v. Demetrius [2009 CarswellOnt 2548 (Ont. S.C.J.)], 2009 CanLII 22797; the necessity component (see, e.g., Docherty; Alfano); and during the discretionary cost-benefit analysis (see, e.g., United City Properties; Abbey (ONCA)). On other occasions, courts have found it to be a stand-alone requirement: see, e.g., Docherty; International Hi-Tech Industries Inc. v. FANUC Robotics Canada Ltd., 2006 BCSC 2011 (B.C. S.C.); Casurina Ltd. Partnership v. Rio Algom Ltd. (2002), 28 B.L.R. (3d) 44 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]); Prairie Well Servicing Ltd. v. Tundra Oil & Gas Ltd., 2000 MBQB 52, 146 Man. R. (2d) 284 (Man. Q.B.). Some clarification of this point will therefore be useful.

53 In my opinion, concerns related to the expert's duty to the court and his or her willingness and capacity to comply with it are best addressed initially in the "qualified expert" element of the Mohan framework: S. C. Hill, D. M. Tanovich and L. P. Strezos, McWilliams' Canadian Criminal Evidence (5th ed. (loose-leaf)), vol. 2, at s. 12:30.20.50; see also Deemar v. College of Veterinarians (Ontario), 2008 ONCA 600, 92 O.R. (3d) 97 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 21; Lederman, Bryant and Fuerst, at pp. 826-27; Halsbury's Laws of Canada: Evidence, at para. HEV-152 "Partiality"; The Canadian Encyclopedic Digest (Ont. 4th ed. (loose-leaf)), vol. 24, Title 62 — Evidence, at § 469. A proposed expert witness who is unable or unwilling to fulfill this duty to the court is not properly qualified to perform the role of an expert. Situating this concern in the "properly qualified expert" ensures that the courts will focus expressly on the important risks associated with biased experts: Hill, Tanovich and Strezos, at s. 12:30.20.50; Paciocco, "Jukebox", at p. 595.

(2) The Gatekeeping Exclusionary Discretion

54 Finding that expert evidence meets the basic threshold does not end the inquiry. Consistent with the structure of the analysis developed following Mohan which I have discussed earlier, the judge must still take concerns about the expert's independence and impartiality into account in weighing the evidence at the gatekeeping stage. At this point, relevance, necessity, reliability and absence of bias can helpfully be seen as part of a sliding scale where a basic level must first be achieved in order to meet the admissibility threshold and thereafter continue to play a role in weighing the overall competing considerations in admitting the evidence. At the end of the day, the judge must be satisfied that the potential helpfulness of the evidence is not outweighed by the risk of the dangers materializing that are associated with expert evidence.

G. Expert Evidence and Summary Judgment

55 I must say a brief word about the procedural context in which this case originates — a summary judgment motion. (I note that these comments relate to the summary judgment regime under the Nova Scotia rules and that different considerations may arise under different rules.) It is common ground that the court hearing the motion can consider only admissible evidence. However, under the Nova Scotia jurisprudence, which is not questioned on this appeal, it is not the role of a judge hearing a summary judgment motion in Nova Scotia to weigh the evidence, draw reasonable inferences from evidence or settle matters of credibility: Coady v. Burton Canada Co., 2013 NSCA 95, 333 N.S.R. (2d) 348 (N.S. C.A.), at paras. 42-44, 87 and 98; Fougere v. Blunden Construction Ltd., 2014 NSCA 52, 345 N.S.R. (2d) 385 (N.S. C.A.), at paras. 6 and 12. Taking these two principles together, the result in my view is this. A motions judge hearing a summary judgment application under the Nova Scotia rules must be satisfied that proposed expert evidence meets the threshold requirements for admissibility at the first step of the analysis, but should generally not engage in the second step cost-benefit analysis. That cost-benefit analysis, in anything other than the most obvious cases of inadmissibility, inevitably involves assigning weight — or at least potential weight — to the evidence.

H. Application

56 I turn to the application of these principles to the facts of the case. In my respectful view, the record amply sustains the result reached by the majority of the Court of Appeal that Ms. MacMillan's evidence was admissible on the summary judgment application. Of course, the framework which I have set out in these reasons was not available to either the motions judge or to the Court of Appeal.

57 There was no finding by the motions judge that Ms. MacMillan was in fact biased or not impartial or that she was acting as an advocate for the shareholders: C.A. reasons, at para. 122. On the contrary, she specifically recognized that she was aware of the standards and requirements that experts be independent. She was aware of the precise guidelines in the accounting industry concerning accountants acting as expert witnesses. She testified that she owed an ultimate duty to the court in testifying as an expert witness: A.R., vol. III, at pp. 75-76; C.A. reasons, at para. 134. To the extent that the motions judge was concerned about the "appearance" of impartiality, this factor plays no part in the test for admissibility, as I have explained earlier.

58 The auditors' claim that Ms. MacMillan lacks objectivity rests on two main points which I will address in turn.

59 First, the auditors say that the earlier work done for the shareholders by the Kentville office of Grant Thornton "served as a catalyst and foundation for the claim of negligence" against the auditors and that this "precluded [Grant Thornton] from acting as 'independent' experts in this case": A.F., at paras. 17 and 19. Ms. MacMilllan, the auditors submit, was in an "irreconcilable conflict of interest, in that she would inevitably have to opine on, and choose between, the actions taken and standard of care exercised by her own partners at Grant Thornton" and those of the auditors: A.F., at para. 21. This first submission, however, must be rejected.

60 The fact that one professional firm discovers what it thinks is or may be professional negligence does not, on its own, disqualify it from offering that opinion as an expert witness. Provided that the initial work is done independently and impartially and the person put forward as an expert understands and is able to comply with the duty to provide fair, objective and non-partisan assistance to the court, the expert meets the threshold qualification in that regard. There is no suggestion here that Grant Thornton was hired to take a position dictated to it by the shareholders or that there was anything more than a speculative possibility of Grant Thornton incurring liability to them if the firm's opinion was not ultimately accepted by the court. There was no finding that Ms. MacMillan was, in fact, biased or not impartial, or that she was acting as an advocate for the shareholders. The auditors' submission that she somehow "admitted" on her cross-examination that she was in an "irreconcilable conflict" is not borne out by a fair reading of her evidence in context: A.R., vol. III, at pp. 139-45. On the contrary, her evidence was clear that she understood her role as an expert and her duty to the court: ibid., at pp. 75-76.

61 The auditors' second main point was that Ms. MacMillan was not independent because she had "incorporated" some of the work done by the Kentville office of her firm. This contention is also ill founded. To begin, I do not accept that an expert lacks the threshold qualification in relation to the duty to give fair, objective and non-partisan evidence simply because the expert relies on the work of other professionals in reaching his or her own opinion. Moreover, as Beveridge J.A. concluded, what was "incorporated" was essentially an exercise in arithmetic that had nothing to do with any accounting opinion expressed by the Kentville office: C.A. reasons, at paras. 146-49.

62 There was no basis disclosed in this record to find that Ms. MacMillan's evidence should be excluded because she was not able and willing to provide the court with fair, objective and non-partisan evidence. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal who concluded that the motions judge committed a palpable and overriding error in determining that Ms. MacMillan was in a conflict of interest that prevented her from giving impartial and objective evidence: paras. 136-50.

IV. Disposition

63 I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Pourvoi rejeté.

Subject: Civil Practice and Procedure; Contracts; Corporate and Commercial; Evidence; Torts

Headnote

Commercial law --- Sale of goods — Buyer's remedies — Damages — Breach of warranty

Purchaser bought loading dock equipment and accessories from vendor for third company, including vehicle restraint safety systems (VRSS) — Purchaser had issues with VRSS — Vendor brought action against purchaser for unpaid invoices; purchasers brought counterclaim against vendor for damages for breach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation — Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed — Vendor was entitled to payment of $67,884.59 for outstanding invoices, plus interest — Vendor did not provide defective product and did not breach its warranty — Purchaser selected, ordered and received total of 33 VRSS, three of which exhibited gouging and another three of which had significant wear and tear — Apart from evidence of expert which was rejected as biased and unreliable, there was no evidence to explain how gouging occurred — Choice of carbon content did not amount to defect — Having found VRSS were not defective, there was no basis for finding that vendor breached its warranty obligations — Purchaser could not satisfy requirements to establish breach pursuant to Sale of Goods Act — Manager may not have chosen best product for company's needs but that could not amount to breach of implied warranty under Act.

Torts --- Negligence — Causation — Miscellaneous

Purchaser bought loading dock equipment and accessories from vendor for third company, including vehicle restraint safety systems (VRSS) — Purchaser had issues with VRSS — Vendor brought action against purchaser for unpaid invoices; purchasers brought counterclaim against vendor for damages for breach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation — Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed — Vendor was entitled to payment of $67,884.59 for outstanding invoices, plus interest — There was no basis for finding that vendor was negligent towards purchaser — Purchaser failed to meet burden of demonstrating that but for vendor's negligence, purchaser would not have suffered damages it alleges — There was no evidence that vendor was negligent in its design or manufacturing of VRSS — Vendor was only manufacturer of restraint systems and had no contact with any end-users — How bid and contract between company and purchaser would extent to or engage vendor's duty of care was mystery.

Torts --- Fraud and misrepresentation — Negligent misrepresentation (Hedley Byrne principle) — Detrimental reliance

Purchaser bought loading dock equipment and accessories from vendor for third company, including vehicle restraint safety systems (VRSS) — Purchaser had issues with VRSS — Vendor brought action against purchaser for unpaid invoices; purchasers brought counterclaim against vendor for damages for breach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation — Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed — Vendor was entitled to payment of $67,884.59 for outstanding invoices, plus interest — Vendor was not liable to purchaser for negligent misrepresentation — There were no representations from vendor specific to purchaser's or company's needs — Purchaser selected VRSS for company without vendor's involvement — Even if vendor's sales person said anything about VRSS being compatible for company's needs, evidence was insufficient to ground finding that this amounted to representation on which purchaser relied to make selection — Manager was never sure that VRSS were suitable for company's needs, he knowingly took risk with VRSS in hope that they would meet his customer's needs — Purchaser was familiar with VRSS and had purchased it for other customers on previous occasions.

Equity --- Equitable doctrines — Equitable set-off

Purchaser bought loading dock equipment and accessories from vendor for third company, including vehicle restraint safety systems (VRSS) — Purchaser had issues with VRSS — Vendor brought action against purchaser for unpaid invoices; purchasers brought counterclaim against vendor for damages for breach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation — Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed — Vendor was entitled to payment of $67,884.59 for outstanding invoices, plus interest — There was no basis for claim for equitable set off — Nobody disputed that purchaser owed vendor money — Purchaser got into trouble with selection and installation of VRSS of its own accord — Party could not come to court with unclean hands and expect court's equity — It was manager who managed relationships in such way that undermined actual identification of response to gouging — Purchaser would have been in far better position to be transparent with vendor about company's directive to replace VRSS altogether.

Evidence --- Opinion — Experts — Weight of evidence

Purchaser bought loading dock equipment and accessories from vendor for third company, including vehicle restraint safety systems (VRSS) — Purchaser had issues with VRSS — Vendor brought action against purchaser for unpaid invoices; purchasers brought counterclaim against vendor for damages for breach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation — Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed — Vendor was entitled to payment of $67,884.59 for outstanding invoices, plus interest — Defendant retained expert to provide opinion on reason for failure of restraints — Expert was qualified as expert in materials failure and metallurgy — Defendant's expert's evidence, while admissible, was only of minimal value and could not be given any weight because of its fundamental flaws and unreliability — Expert proved to be biased and either unable or unwilling to appreciate nature of his duties to court — Expert did not follow or apply standard methodology, he took number of shortcuts to meet his client's deadline — It was especially troubling that expert did not question information he received form defendant.

ACTION by vendor for amount of unpaid invoices; COUNTERCLAIM by purchaser for damages for beach of warranty, negligence and negligent misrepresentation.

Tzimas J.*:

1 The plaintiff, Pentalift Equipment Corporation, (Pentalift), commenced an action against the defendant 1371787 Inc. o/a Pro-Door & Dock System, (Pro-Door), to collect the sum of $67,884.50, plus interest and costs for unpaid invoices for the supply of loading dock equipment and accessories, including the supply of 33 model RVR32 Vehicle Restraint Safety Systems (RVR32s).

2 Pro-Door did not dispute that it owed money to Pentalift but defended the action on the basis that the RVR32s that were supplied were defective. Pro-Door brought a counterclaim against Pentalift for damages for breach of warranty, negligence, and negligent misrepresentations in the sum of $299,000, plus interest and costs. It asked that any amounts that are found to be payable by Pro-Door to Pentalift be set off against any damage award it receives.

3 For the reasons that follow I have come to the conclusion that the RVR32s supplied by Pentalift were not defective and that Pentalift did not breach its warranty or act negligently in any way. Pentalift is entitled to judgment and Pro-Door's counterclaim is dismissed.

BACKGROUND FACTS

4 The following facts are not materially in dispute:

a) Pentalift is a manufacturer of loading dock equipment, including vehicle restraint systems.

b) Pro-Door is a dealer of dock equipment. It was hired by Hopewell Logistics Inc., (Hopewell), to supply and install 20 vehicle restraint systems at Hopewell's Distribution Centre. Pro-Door also managed the operations of Hopewell's Distribution Centre.

c) Hopewell is a third party logistics provider for Mondelez Food Products Canada ("Mondelez"). Mondolez has a relationship with among other food suppliers, Kraft Foods Ltd. and Cadbury. Hopewell's Distribution Centre operates 62 dock doors on a 24 / 7 basis and receives everything from every day trucks to cargo containers for ships and trains.

d) Corlan Electric Inc., (Corlan), was the general contractor hired by Mondelez to support its capital financing. Corlan qualified Pro-Door to be Hopewell's supplier. At all material times, Pro-Door received its instructions from Hopewell.

e) Restraint systems are used at loading docks to secure vehicles that are there to load or unload product. They are either mounted on the dock wall or they are secured to the ground. Either way, they are essential to the safety of the dock workers and the truck drivers, as they are used to prevent a truck from rolling away from the dock as the loading and unloading occurs.

f) The RVR32 is a vehicle restraint system that is mounted on the wall and that secures a truck by hooking into the truck's rear impact guard. It has two components: i) the vehicle restraint; and ii) the communications system and control panel. The system is mounted on the wall of the dock and essentially hooks in the truck that is there to load or unload. More particularly, the system operates in the following way:

i. As a truck reverses into the loading dock, the truck's rear impact guard, also known as the ICC bar, (the "ICC Bar") impacts directly on the RVR32. The impact causes the restraint to adjust to the truck's height. Sensors in the system are activated as well to permit the height adjustments to take place.

ii. A dock worker then activates the RVR32's hook by pushing a button on the control panel inside the dock. The hook rotates upwards to capture and secure the ICC bar.

iii. Once the hook secures the ICC Bar, inside the Dock, the LEX deluxe light changes from red to green. This tells the dockworker that the truck is secure and that the forklift can proceed to load or unload as the case may be.

iv. Outside of the dock, the truck driver sees a red light and warning sign indicating not to move the trailer because of the loading / unloading underway.

v. Once the task is completed, the dock worker pushes a button on the control panel inside the dock to lower the hook and effectively to disengage it from the ICC Bar. The lights both in and out of the dock change as well signalling to both the dock worker that the truck driver that the truck trailer is free to go and that is no longer hooked to the dock.

g) In 2015, Hopewell decided that 50 of its ageing restraint systems had to be replaced. The project was divided into phases. The first phase would see the replacement of twenty systems, with the balance to follow in a subsequent phase or phases.

h) Following a bidding process, Hopewell, with Corlan's approval, selected Pro-Door to supply the new restraints. Pro-Door turned to Pentalift for the purchase of the restraints.

i) Pentalift and Pro-Door had an existing relationship. In 2009, Pro-Door submitted a Credit Application to Pentalift which was accepted and contained the following terms:

i. payment of each invoice due by the 30th day following the date of each invoice, (the "Due Date");

ii. an interest rate of 24% per annum to accrue on unpaid invoice balances after the Due Date; and

iii. no warranties, expressed or implied, including any implied warranty of merchantability or any implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, exist on any order.

j) In keeping with the Agreement, Pro-Door made a number of purchases for dock equipment from Pentalift for use at various locations. The parties agreed that none of the locations where the equipment was installed was nearly as busy as Hopewell's Distribution Centre.

k) On or about September 17, 2015, Pro-Door submitted a 'Pentalift RVR32Vehicle Restraint System Site Information Sheet' to Pentalift for a quotation for the purchase of 33 RVR32 Systems. Twenty of them were for Hopewell, 8 were for another project and 5 were overstock for Pro-Door's purposes.

l) On or about September 23, 2015, Pentalift issued the quotation for the supply of 33 RVR32 Systems. Pro-Door accepted the quotation the following day and submitted Purchase Order No. PO22122 to Pentalift for the purchase of the 33 RVR32 systems for a total price of $106,462.95, inclusive of HST.

m) On December 11, 2015, Pro-Door sent a courier to Pentalift's facility to pick up 15 of the RVR32 systems and Pentalift issued the corresponding invoice. That invoice is not in contention.

n) On December 15, 2015 Pro-Door picked up the remaining 18 systems and Pentalift issued its invoice.

o) The 33 RVR32 systems that Pentalift delivered to Pro-Door were in accordance with Pentalift's standard features, operating range and properties. The RVR32s were not altered in any way from Pentalift's usual course of manufacturing the particular model. Nor were they made to measure for Hopewell's particular needs.

p) Pro-Door made various other equipment orders from Pentalift in the months of January, February, and March. These orders were not for Hopewell and the quality for the product provided is not in dispute.

q) The outstanding balance to Pentalift, which as admitted by Pro-Door is as follows:

Invoice No.	Invoice Date	Invoice Amount	Description
156116	Dec. 15, 2015	$58,066.63	18 x RVR32 Systems
157330	Feb. 17, 2016	$2,354.36	4 x 2 DIA (1/4 Wall) Cylinder and freight
157668	March 3, 2016	$2,097.14	25 x brake band assembly, band, brake
157867	March 14, 2016	$4,263.08	1 x 72" W x 16"L x 1/2" bare lip
157868	March 14, 2016	$309.62	1 x dock leveller 6' wide x 8' long
157958	March 17, 2016	$793.67	4 x lifting arm weldment
Outstanding Balance		$67,884.50

r) The parties agreed that Pentalift's RVR32s came with a standard manufacturer's warranty that product would be free from defects in material and workmanship under normal use for a period of one year from the date of shipment of the equipment. In the event that the product proved to be defective in material or workmanship, Pentalift would, at its option, either replace the product or the defective portion without charge to the purchaser, or alter or repair the product, on site or elsewhere, without charge to the purchaser. The Warranty also:

i. Specifies that a fully completed Product Registration Card is required by Pentalift prior to the review of processing of any warranty requests or claims;

ii. Specifically does not cover "parts requiring replacement due to damage resulting from abuse, improper operations, improper or insufficient lubrications, lack of proper protection or vehicle impact;

iii. Specifically does not cover any failure caused by improper installation, misapplication, overloading, abuse, negligence or failure to lubricate and adjust or maintain the equipment properly and regularly; and

iv. Expressly states that: "THERE ARE NO WARRANTIES, EXPRESSED OR IMPLIED, WHICH EXTEND BEYOND THE DESCRIPTION ON THE FACE HEREOF, AND THERE IS NO WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABILITY OR OF FITNESS FOR A PARTICULAR PURPOSE".

s) The RVR32s were installed by Pro-Door at Hopewell's Distribution Centre over 10 days between January 13, 2016 and February 18, 2016.

t) The parties' evidence diverges on the nature of the complaints that followed, their respective responses, and the ultimate outcomes.

EVIDENCE and POSITION OF THE PARTIES

a) Pentalift's Evidence and Position

5 Pentalift submitted that the RVR32s that were delivered to Pro-Door for their use at Hopewell's Distribution Centre were free from any defect. All 33 RVR32s were manufactured according to the same standard specifications, using the same steel, with the same carbon content and in accordance with industry standards and requirements.

6 Pro-Door selected the particular model for Hopewell of its own accord and without any consultation with Pentalift. Pro-Door had purchased the particular model on numerous previous occasions and was familiar with its features. Moreover, at no time in the past had it encountered any difficulties or made any complaints with the RVR32s.

7 Pentalift called evidence from Ms. Rachel Verkerke, an Inside Sales Representative at Pentalift who handled Pro-Door's order, Rick Rowan, an Engineering Manager at Pentalift and previously a Designer for Pentalift, and Mr. Clint Glass, the Vice-President of Pentalift.

8 Pentalift also relied on the evidence of Mr. DeGasperis, the Owner and Operations Manager of Pro-Door and of Jeremy Olsen, the Safety Supervisor of Hopewell, to round out and corroborate its position and claim for judgment.

9 Pentalift asked the Court to dismiss Dr. Mehdi Taheri's expert evidence, which was called by ProDoor, as either inadmissible or unreliable, biased and seriously flawed, such that it should be given no weight whatsoever.

10 Ms. Verveke, confirmed that Pro-Door selected the RVR32s model of its own accord. Ms. Verkerke was the main point of contact for Mr. DeGasperis when he placed orders with Pentalift for equipment and she confirmed that Pro-Door was Pentalift's client since 2009 when Pro-Door submitted a credit application.

11 She explained that typically, Mr. DeGasperis would either phone or e-mail Ms. Verkerke for a quote for a specific piece of equipment and she would prepare a formal quotation for his review and approval. There was nothing remarkably different with this order. Mr. DeGasperis followed the same process. He accepted Pentalift's quotation and proceeded with the submission of a Purchase Order. The order stipulated that the buyer is to make sure that they have reviewed all the specifications and information provided for the order and that the order reflects what the buyer requires.

12 In accordance with the Pro-Door's Purchase Order, Pentalift proceeded to manufacture the RVR32s. Ms. Verkerke could not recall Mr. DeGasperis raising any issues with her about any other RVR32s previously purchased by Pro-Door.

13 Mr. Rowan testified extensively with respect to the design of the RVR32 System. He explained that there are various types of restraints in the market and that the materials that are used must be strong enough to hold a truck back from moving away. He also described the requirements of the Canadian Standards Association and identified the required properties for the steel that is used to make the restraints. He said that the RVR32s met those requirements.

14 Mr. Rowan testified that he was the one who was responsible for the design of the RVR32s. He explained that the mechanical features were standard and could not be customized to the needs of a particular client. The only aspect that a client could customize was the electrical device to meet the particular voltage demands. Finally, he described the yield strength and the strength in the steel materials used to manufacture the particular model.

15 Specifically with respect to the 33 RVR32s that were delivered to Pro-Door, Mr. Rowan explained that they would have been tested before they were delivered to Pro-Door.

16 On the subject of the gouging, Mr. Rowan could not explain the cause. He said that Pentalift had made upwards of 600 hundred restraints and had not encountered any gouging problems. He explained that the factors that could explain the gouging included the strength of materials used and their resistance to deformation, the installation method, the particular use and the frequency of that use, the sharpness of the ICC device on trucks, and the speed with which trucks backed into the restraint. He further suggested that if the rear guard to a truck hit the restraint at the same point all the time, eventually the system would be weakened.

17 In cross-examination, Mr. Rowan admitted that over the years there were several a changes to the RVR32s. He described the changes as evolutionary that touched on everything from the switch-brand, the switch mechanism, the design of the hook, and the grade of the steel. In response to questions about the carbon content, he explained that the carbon content in the steel could vary from shipment to shipment. Considerations that went into the selection of the steel and its carbon content included the availability of a particular grade, the weldability of the steel and its brittleness. Upgrades to a model would occur in reaction to various considerations, including the supplier's availability of materials, the cost of materials, and innovations in a particular design.

18 Mr. Rowan agreed that the RVR32s manufactured by Pentalift after 2016 and following Pro-Door's order were made with new and enhanced materials. He explained that the stronger steel used since 2016 was not readily available prior to that time.

19 Finally, with respect to the defence's theory concerning the inadequacy of the strength and hardness of the RVR32s, Mr. Rowan agreed that the RVR32s that were delivered to Pro-Door were not as strong as what Pentalift produces today but that at the time, what Pro-Door received was equipment with standard features. Moreover, at no point did Pro-Door advise Pentalift of the specific application of the RVR32s. Nor did it make any inquiries as to whether the RVR32s had adequate capacity to meet Hopewell's specific needs.

20 The next person to testify was Mr. Glass. He explained that he had worked closely on various orders for Pro-Door and that Pro-Door was a decent customer. At the height of Pentalift's relationship with Pro-Door, Mr. Glass thought that they processed 30 orders a year.

21 Mr. Glass reviewed the purchase orders pertaining to Pro-Door and confirmed the outstanding sum of $67,884. He further confirmed that not all of the invoices related to the 33 RVR32s.

22 With respect to the selection of restraint equipment, Mr. Glass explained that typically, dealers, such as Pro-Door will receive directions from the end user concerning the particular needs. Restraint systems may be manual or they may be automated. As well, the restraint may operate with either an impact or a non-impact mechanism. Manual systems are the cheapest on the market.

23 A dealer, such as Pro-Door could ask a manufacturer such as Pentalift about various model options and it could go as far as seeking a recommendation for the purchase of a particular piece of equipment. However, such consultations are typically very rare. Mr. Glass went on to explain that Pentalift ships locally and internationally and does not know who the end-user is; that is the dealer's responsibility.

24 Mr. Glass also explained that it is for the dealer to consider the height of the docks, the mounting surface for the restraints, whether a wall can withstand the restraint, the types of trucks that will be backing up into the restraint system, the effect of tailgates on trucks for the restraint sensors, and last but not least, budgetary constraints. Specifically in relation to cost, Mr. Glass referred to equipment from Rite Hite and Metro but said that their equipment had different specific features and were far more expensive than Pentalift's RVR32s.

25 With respect to Pro-Door's purchase order that is the subject of this claim, Mr. Glass testified that at no point did Pro-Door provide Pentalift with any specifications. He explained that the RVR32s had standard features that came with certain accessories but that they were manufactured in the same manner at all times. He further explained that Pro-Door would have been aware of the RVR32's standard features because they had purchased them in the past.

26 Turning to the specific restraints that were delivered to Pro-Door, Mr. Glass confirmed that there were some initial difficulties when the systems were installed that related to the hooking ranges and the electrical connections. The gouging complaint surfaced with respect to three of the systems. Another three may have had some accelerated wear and tear but it was not until June 2016 when Mr. DeGasperis complained about all twenty systems. Of the twenty systems at Hopewell, 14 did not exhibit any gouging. There were also no complaints for the eight systems that were installed at one of Pro-Door's other customers or the five that Pro-Door ordered for additional stock.

27 Mr. Glass explained that Pro-Door was responsible for the installation. On the electrical issue, that was a problem for Pro-Door to resolve. For the hooking, once Pentalift understood the nature of the problem it adjusted the sensor range for the operation of the hook. As far as Pentalift knew, that adjustment took care of the problem.

28 On the subject of the gouging, Mr. Glass said that initially they were advised of the problem for one of the twenty systems that were installed at Hopewell. He believed that the complaint was brought to his attention in April of 2016. Mr. Glass took the court through multiple e-mail exchanges with Mr. DeGasperis about this specific problem. He highlighted Pentalift's willingness to develop a kit that would address the particular concern. The kit involved the welding of extra steel onto the restraints to provide more surface space for the ICC bars to contact.

29 Leading up to the kit proposal, Mr. Glass said that in his four years with Pentalift this was the first time he had heard of such a problem and he considered it to be an isolated incident. He also believed that there would be an easy remedy to the situation.

30 In an e-mail communication dated May 27, 2016, Mr. Glass proposed that the kit be applied immediately to the three docks that had problems, that Pro-Door have seven days to pay its outstanding account, that Pentalift would take back from ProDoor the five unused systems and would waive the 25% restocking fee, and that Pentalift would reinstate ProDoor's 30 day credit terms once the account was completely cleared of the past due invoices. Pentalift refused to agree to credit Pro-Door $5,000 on account of the additional labour costs that Pro-Door said it incurred to fix the electrical and the hooking range issues.

31 In the communications that followed, Mr. DeGasperis asked that the proposed kit be applied to all twenty systems and he refused to make any payment until the installation of the kit was completed. As these negotiations were underway, Mr. Glass learned to his dismay that Mr. DeGasperis had written to Hopewell to advise that Pentalift was refusing to fix the restraints, that he did not know how the gouging would be fixed, and that if necessary, Pro-Door would either come up with its own solution or remove the systems and replace them with knew ones. Mr. Glass could not understand why Pro-Door would "throw us under the bus" in its communications with Hopewell.

32 Eventually, Pentalift indicated that it would be willing to undertake the kit installation at its own material and labour costs for all twenty systems. Mr. Glass estimated that the total cost to Pentalift would be approximately $2,000 and that it would take about a week to install the kits to the 20 systems. Mr. Glass was puzzled by the request since there were no complaints for the remaining 17 systems. The pre-requisite for the fix however was Pro-Door's confirmation that it pay the outstanding invoices.

33 In the course of these exchanges, Mr. Glass explained that he was led to believe that Hopewell had not yet paid Pro-Door for the 20 systems. Mr. DeGasperis told Mr. Glass repeatedly that Pentalift would get paid when Pro-Door got paid. In fact, Mr. DeGasperis' representations on this were misleading because Hopewell, through Corlan Electric had gone ahead and paid Pro-Door for the 20 systems. Mr. Glass learned of this at the discoveries for examination.

34 Mr. Glass made it abundantly clear that in Pentalift's view there was no defect in the systems and that the proposed offer was intended as a goodwill gesture and in recognition of the longstanding relationship between the two companies. Mr. Glass made that position clear as early as April 20, 2016, when he advised Pro-Door that the gouging of the steel was not a product defect or a warranty issue covered by Pentalift's Warranty. Mr. Glass advised Pro-Door that in his view the gouging had to be the result of an irregular impact guard or ICC bar.

35 Mr. Glass concluded his testimony with the explanation that his last exchange with Mr. DeGasperis occurred on or about July 5, 2016, when Mr. DeGasperis cancelled a meeting intended to come to a resolution of the dispute. It was not until late 2016 or early 2017 that Pentalift learned that ProDoor had removed all of the systems from Hopewell's facilities and replaced them with ground-mounted restraint systems from Metro Dock.

36 In addition to the evidence led by the plaintiff's various witnesses, Pentalift highlighted the following admissions from Mr. DeGasperis' and Mr. Olsen's testimony that they concluded supported their position:

a. Pro-Door submitted a bid to Hopewell for Phase I in June, 2015, specifically for the supply and installation of 20 RVR32 Systems and well before it had any communications with Pentalift about the needs of Hopewell's Distribution Centre;

b. Hopewell relied on Pro-Door's expertise for the selection of an appropriate restraint system and on that basis Pro-Door and Mondelez entered in an agreement for the Phase I installation of the restraints; it had no contact whatsoever with Pentalift;

c. Mr. DeGasperis was not certain if the RVR32 Systems could meet the needs at the Distribution Centre but he alone decided to take the risk; and

d. Mr. DeGasperis admitted that he reviewed the Owner's Manual which stipulated Pentalift's recommendation that users of the restraint device review the means of attachment to a transport vehicle, which included the ICC bar.

37 Pentalift also asked the court to draw a negative inference from the fact that although Mr. DeGasperis gave an undertaking to produce a copy of the Bid and the Phase I Agreement with Mondelez he failed to do so. Pentalift's inability to review those documents was to its detriment as it was deprived of the opportunity to understand the precise details of Pro-Door's commitment and undertaking with respect to the restraints and its specific selection of the RVR32s.

b) Pro-Door's Position

38 Pro-Door claimed that the problems with the RVR32s surfaced almost immediately following their installation. Although Mr. DeGasperis admitted to taking a risk with the use of the RVR32s for Hopewell's needs, he blamed the ultimate breakdown of the relationship between Pentalift and Pro-Door on Pentalift's refusal to remedy the gouging problem and on its insistence that it be paid.

39 Mr. DeGasperis said repeatedly that Pentalift only cared for the money and was not interested to find a solution to the gouging problem. Eventually, Hopewell lost its patience with what it perceived to be Pro-Door's inability to resolve the gouging problem and rejected the RVR32s altogether. Pro-Door had to replace the RVR32s at its own cost or face litigation.

40 In Pro-Door's view, Pentalift breached its warranty because the RVR32 Systems were defective. Pro-Door relied on the evidence led by Dr. Tahir for that conclusion. Moreover, Pro-Door submitted that Pentalift was made aware of Hopewell's specific needs and that if it were not happy with the outcome Hopewell would demand the repair or replacement of the systems. As a result, Pro-Door claimed that it was entitled to damages, not only for costs incurred to replace the RVR32 Systems with a ground mounted product from Metro Hook Restraints, but also for the lost opportunity to be awarded the subsequent phases of Hopewell's restraint replacement project.

41 Specifically with respect to the evidence underpinning Pro-Door's position, as already mentioned, the Court heard from Mr. Olsen, the Safety Supervisor for Hopewell, the expert, Dr. Tahir and Mr. DeGasperis.

42 Mr. Olsen explained the bid process and the Hopewell's needs. He went on to explain that within a few days of the installation of the restraint systems, they encountered problems with the operations. Alarms were going off indicating that the restraints were not attaching properly. He also received reports of the restraints releasing prematurely and in some instances the restraints would not adjust for the height of the incoming trailer. The alarm issues surfaced within a couple days. The release problem surfaced within a week.

43 Mr. Olsen said that he brought up the problems with Pro-Door immediately. He expressed frustration with these difficulties because a malfunctioning restraint system meant that the dock where that restraint system was located could not be used. Given the volume of traffic at the Distribution Centre, this was a real problem.

44 Mr. Olsen believed that Pentalift came out to Hopewell's Distribution Centre in the middle of March. He thought that they provided some suggestions on what was causing the issues and that they tried to repair the problems. He acknowledged that Pentalift made various adjustments to the sensors. They also installed spacers to prevent the trucks from coming too close to the building. In his view, none of these "fixes" resolved the problems.

45 Mr. Olsen said that they continued to experience issues with the restraints and were prepared to work with anyone who could help them. He was under the impression that the funds for the RVR32s were withheld and would be withheld until the restraints were in good working condition. Mr. Olsen was not aware that Corlan Electric had gone ahead and paid Pro-Door for the Pentalift systems and he thought that might have an error. He was also not aware that Pro-Door was telling Pentalift that it could not pay Pentalift until it received payment from Hopewell or Mondelez.

46 Mr. Olsen also said that around the same time as the difficulties with Pentalift's systems, he began to consider his options for the remaining phases of the restraint replacements.

47 In light of the continued difficulties with the RVR32s, Mr. Olsen said that they decided to try out a Metro Dock restraint for one of the docks. This was installed on June 7, 2016. That product performed as expected, with minimal issues. In the meantime, the problems with the Pentalift Restraints continued through the summer of 2016. He said that they "struggled through the summer", using rubber wheel chalks to prevent trailers from sliding away. By October 2016 they started replacing the RVR32s with the Metro Dock restraints. He thought that the decision to replace the RVR32s was made in late May or early June of 2016.

48 Mr. Olsen could not explain the reason for the alarms going off or for the hooking problem. He also agreed that eventually the "hooking issues" were cleared but he also thought that they reappeared. As far as the gouging was concerned, in his view, the restraints were damaged by the trucks that were jamming into them. He confirmed that Hopewell did not have any protocol on how the trucks should back into the docks. He thought it was possible that some trucks might be backing in too quickly. He also agreed that some trucks might have damaged ICC bars. Finally, he agreed that nobody inspected the trucks as they came into the Distribution Centre.

49 Mr. Olsen said that he could not recall if he was advised of Pentalift's proposed remedies. He also could not recall if he was ever aware that Pentalift never refused to address the issues though he agreed that he was never given the opportunity to consider Pentalift's proposed kit. Instead he explained that by April 26, they had already started shopping around for another option. Mr. Olsen ultimately confirmed that he was not aware that Pro-Door was continuing discussions with Pentalift to work out a solution for the gouging.

50 When Mr. Olsen was asked if the reason he started to look for other options was because of the information that Pentalift was refusing to fix the systems, he said: "I suppose it seems that way".

51 For the subsequent phases, Mr. Olsen confirmed that Pro-Door did not get the contract. Nor was ProDoor asked to provide a quote. Mr. Olsen did say that at the beginning of the original bidding, the expectation had been that as the successful bidder on Phase I, Pro-Door would undertake the subsequent phases, even though those would be subject to an independent bidding process. But he also agreed that the model they selected for the subsequent phases was not one that Pro-Door could supply.

52 Going back Pro-Door's successful bid, Mr. Olsen explained that they were attracted to that bid because Pro-Door proposed a wall-mounted restraint system. Pro-Door also identified the specific manufacturer of the restraint system. The competing bid proposed a ground-mounted restraint system, something that they did not want because they wanted to avoid the problems associated with snow and ice build-up at the foot of the mounts during the winter months.

53 Mr. Olsen also confirmed that he relied on Pro-Door's judgment on the selection of the RVR32s; he had no experience whatsoever with them. Mr. Olsen did not know if Pro-Door followed Pentalift's recommendation that it consider Hopewell's facility design, the nature of the truck fleets and their designs arriving at Hopewell's Distribution Centre, and the ICC bars in use, before selecting a restraint system.

54 Mr. Olsen also confirmed that unlike the advanced testing of the Metro Dock system, there was no advanced testing of the RVR32. Mr. Olsen also would not confirm whether Mondelez had a budget limit in mind for Phase I. He merely indicated that Modelez and Hopewell accepted Pro-Door's bid.

55 Mr. Olsen was asked about his knowledge of an alternative restrain system produced by Rite Hite. Although he said he was not familiar with all of the Rite Hite models he did indicate that Hopewell did not ask Rite Hite to bid on the replacement project because the Rite Hite restraints were significantly more expensive. He agreed that Pentalift's system, installed, had an approximate price of $6,000 while Rite Hite's system, installed, had an approximate cost of $10,000. He said that he never saw the price for the Metro Dock system. When shown an invoice from Metro dated September 20, 2016, Mr. Olsen agreed that the unit cost was $4,750.

56 Finally with respect to the Metro Dock option, Mr. Olsen explained that although that system was ground mounted, they added a heating pad at the base to eliminate the problem with the snow and ice accumulation. He also agreed that they invited Rite Hite to bid for Phase II.

57 The next person to testify was Dr. Mehdi Tahir, who was qualified as an expert in "materials failure and metallurgy". He provided the court with his curriculum vitae, he said he understood his duty as an expert to be objective and he submitted an executed copy of hit his Acknowledgment of Expert's Duty. He advised the court that this was the first time that he was testifying as an expert.

58 Dr. Tahir prepared an expert report wherein he concluded that the gouging in the RVR32s was the result of a design defect and specifically in relation to the steel that was used to manufacture the RVR32 System. He explained that the steel material that was used for the carriage assembly did not have sufficient hardness to prevent the gouging.

59 Dr. Tahir outlined his methodology. He said that when he carries out an independent investigation he performs a mechanical systems test and a materials systems test so that he might determine impartially the causation of either a materials or a mechanical failure. The mechanical testing system involves testing and analyzing the load applied to material to determine if the system in question is being misused. Typically, as part of that testing, Dr. Tahir will examine loss locations and review the components involved.

60 Dr. Tahir also explained that when he conduct is analysis and investigation he would ask the client for documentation and important information; conduct witness interviews; attend at the incident loss location and document it; examine the component that failed at the loss location; examine exemplar components at the incident loss location; and if necessary, determine whether material testing needs to be carried out to determine if loading was excessive for a particular application.

61 Having explained his usual methodology, Dr. Tahir then confirmed that he did not follow it in the development of his opinion for this matter. Specifically, he agreed that:

a) He did not carry out an independent investigation or onsite visit of the Distribution Centre;

b) He asked Pro-Door for "documentation and important information" but he did not verify if what he received was true. Nor did he undertake any independent review of any of the relevant documentation because Pro-Door did not provide him with anything;

c) He said that Pro-Door gave very little time to produce an opinion. He said that although he would have reviewed the relevant documentation had it been provided, he also acknowledged that he would not have had the time to produce his opinion in a timely manner;

d) He carried out a visual inspection of six RVR32 Systems at Pro-Door's Facility on June 1, 2018;

e) He did not compare the RVR32s that were gouged to any of the 13 or 14 that were not;

f) His exemplar was a Rite Hite system that Pro-Door provided him; it was not even from one of the Rite Hite systems at Hopewell;

g) He retained Acumen to conduct a metallurgical analysis of a cut piece of 1 RVR32 System and a cut piece from Rite Hite;

h) He was not aware that Pro-Door installed the RVR32 systems at Hopewell in 2016. He said he was told that the systems were installed in 2017;

i) He believed that there were approximately eight systems that had gouging. He did not know the complaint related to only three systems;

j) He thought that the RVR32s were a new restraint system by Pentalift. He did not know that Pentalift manufactured over 600 RVR32s;

k) He was led to believe by Pro-Door that the Pentalift restraints installed at other facilities exhibited similar damage to the incident restraints installed at Hopewell's Distribution Centre;

l) He did not carry out independent witness interviews;

m) He did not investigate the application of the RVR32s at the Distribution Centre;

n) He concluded that the installation and application of the RVR32s were likely not factors in the causation of the problem but he never was in a position to evaluate the installation;

o) He was unable to explain, even with respect to the 6 RVR32s that he did examine why only three had gouging while the other three had only wear and tear issues;

p) He drew conclusions about Pentalift's consideration of ICC bars without the benefit of any independent information. He concluded in particular that Pentalift must have failed to take into account the various hardness of the ICC bars, without any evidence to support what Pentalifit did or did not consider when it designed the RVR32s;

q) He did not undertake any independent inquiry to determine how the RVR32s were removed from the Distribution Centre to Pro-Door, or how they were stored in the period between the fall of 2016 and his examination in June 2018. He agreed that the systems he saw might have been damaged when they were ripped out of the Distribution Centre;

r) He was not aware of the actual service loads that were applied to the RVR32s at the Distribution Centre;

s) He did not consider the types of trucks that came to the Distribution Centre or the types of ICC bars on those trucks. He did agree that a damaged ICC Bar would cause it to have a harder surface than an ICC bar that is not damaged and that accordingly, a damaged ICC bar would affect the restraint system on impact;

t) Finally, he failed to consider, much less, rule out other probable causes.

62 Having regard for the metallurgical analysis of the steel used in the RVR32s, Dr. Tahir hypothesized that since the wear and tear was clustered on the sloped surface of the restraint, the gouging was caused by a sharp ICC Bar that hit the slope of the carriage.

63 Dr. Tahir conceded that an "apples to apples" analysis would have required a comparison between the RVR32s that had gouging in them and the RVR32s that did not have any gouging. He was reluctant to agree that the comparison between an RVR32 and the Rite Hite model amounted to an "apples and oranges" analysis.

64 As between the carbon content in the RVR32s and the Rite Hite Exemplar, Dr. Tahir reported a 19% difference, with the RVRs having a low carbon content and the Rite Hite having a medium carbon content. He did not however know that the RVR32s met the industry mandates and requirements. Nor did he seem familiar with the existence of any standards.

65 Mr. DeGasperis was the last witness to testify. He confirmed that he took a risk with the Pentalift restraints and remarkably, he said that on more than one occasion during his testimony. He said that Pentalift gave him a good price, he had a good rapport with Pentalift, and although he had reservations because the RVRs were a new product, he went ahead with the order. He said that he did not consider other manufacturers.

66 Mr. DeGasperis said that he spoke to Scott McCorquodale, who he thought was a sales guy at Pentalift in the late summer, early fall of 2015, to obtain reassurances that he would not have any problems with the RVR32s and he obtained those reassurances. He asked Mr. McCorquodale if he was comfortable supplying so many units and he said that he did not see any problem. He believed that he and Mr. McCorquodale met at the Distribution Centre to fill out the Site Information Sheet and to get the order going. Mr. DeGasperis admitted that he had used the RVR32s at other locations, though he conceded that those other locations had smaller operations. He specifically said that the Hopewell Distribution Centre was a very busy place and that the order "was a guinea pig job to see if we would expand to other places".

67 Mr. DeGasperis described the problems he had with this project as ten times greater than anything else that he had encountered. He explained that there were complaints right away. At first, Pro-Door tried to make adjustments on their own. When they realized that the problems were more serious, they called Pentalift.

68 Mr. DeGasperis explained that the light switches were not working and that the hooks were not picking up the ICC Bars properly. He said that all of the twenty systems had this problem. He said that Pentalift was throwing ideas at them but they could not fix the problem for over a month. He went on to explain that some of Pentalift's "fixes" worked for a while but then the problems re-emerged.

69 Mr. DeGasperis said that the gouging started to appear in February / March of 2016. He described the problem as progressively getting worse. He admitted that Pentalift was only advised of this problem two months into its first discovery. At a later point in the testimony Mr. DeGasperis thought that Pentalift was advised of the gouging as soon as it was discovered.

70 Mr. DeGasperis testified that he was under extreme pressure from Hopewell and Mondelez. At the same time, while Mr. DeGasperis was trying to fix the restraints or obtain replacements, in his view, Pentalift only cared about getting paid. Mr. DeGasperis expressed the concern that if he paid Pentalift, they would walk away and not attend to the repairs. He took Mr. Glass's responses to mean that the problems they were encountering were Pro-Door's and that they had nothing to do with Pentalift.

71 On the subject of the kit, he said he never saw it and Pentalift told him nothing about the kit. He admitted that there was a lot of yelling and many heated conversations. It came to the point where he was no longer interested in any repairs or restorations. When Mr. DeGasperis was asked about what he understood Pentalift's repair proposal to be, he responded that Pentalift wanted to see the money and he wanted to see the restraints operating properly. He also admitted that by late April he had started discussions with Metro Dock for the replacement of the systems.

72 Mr. DeGasperis agreed that he did not discuss Pentalift's proposed kit repair with Hopewell and with Mr. Olsen in particular. He did not see the point because Hopewell was very unhappy and they were done with Pentalift. In cross-examination he described Pentalift's proposal as a crazy idea that he was not going to discuss with Mr. Olsen. He also indicated that Mr. Olsen considered him to be a pain in the neck.

73 Mr. DeGasperis also said that for every e-mail exchange, Mr. DeGasperis thought there were ten conversations back and forth, Ultimately, Mr. DeGasperis explained his proposal to Pentalift that would have had Pentalift fix the systems at three docks, Pro-Door would then pay a substantial sum owing but hold back $10,000, the Pentalift would fix the remaining systems, and finally Pro-Door would release the remaining sum of $10,000. Eventually, Mr. DeGasperis said that they just came to an impasse.

74 With respect to the payment from Corlan Electric, Mr. DeGasperis admitted that he was surprised they were paid but he chose not to say anything to Pentalift; if he did, he thought that Pentalift would disappear from the scene. Instead, Mr. DeGasperis decided that he would hold back that money to pay for the replacement systems that he had already decided to purchase.

75 Mr. DeGasperis provided evidence on the cost of the Metro Dock restraints and his labour costs associated with the removal and replacement of the restraints. The total cost for the Metro Dock restraints came to $95,000. The labour costs were about $25,121. He also said that the RVR32s were brought back to Pro-Door's facilities and remain stored in their shelves. He had no explanation for why Hopewell would agree to testing a Metro Dock restraint system but would not agree to having Pentalift try out the kit and the repair it was proposing. At one point in his testimony, Mr. DeGasperis suggested that there was nothing preventing Pentalift from showing up at the Distribution Centre to apply the kits.

76 Finally, Mr. DeGasperis estimated the subsequent phases of Hopewell's replacement project to have a value of $180,000 or so. He did not provide any supporting evidence for that estimate.

77 On the subject of what information Mr. DeGasperis provided Dr. Tahir, he was less than forthcoming. He said that all 20 of the restraints were on the Pro-Door shelves but he could not recall what information he gave Dr. Tahir. He thought that he gave him an overview of the progression of the damages. He could not recall if he told Dr. Tahir that the RVR32s at other locations exhibited similar types of damages.

ANALYSIS

78 The telltale to this dispute rests with Mr. DeGasperis' admission that he took a risk when he selected the RVR32s for his client. Mr.DeGasperis chose to experiment with Pentalift's RVR32w for Hopewell, where the demands and the high volume traffic likely exceeded the capacity that RVR32s could handle. Price and budgetary considerations must have played a significant role in Hopewell's preferences and Pro-Door was looking to expand its business from smaller operations to higher volume customers like Hopewell. Mr. DeGasperis was candid about his concerns about the RVR32s' capacity. He described Pro-Door's purchase order to Pentalift as "a guinea pig job to see if we could expand in other places".

79 While in my review of the evidence I found myself somewhat sympathetic with Pro-Door's predicament, the uncontested evidence was that Mr. DeGasperis knowingly took a risk with the RVR32s, in the hope that they would meet his customer's needs. Unfortunately for Pro-Door the experiment faltered. When it came to finding a "fix" to the gouging, Mr. DeGasperis made matters worse by pursuing competing and contrary narratives as Pro-Door and Pentalift and Pro-Door and Hopewell. To Pentalift he said that Hopewell was applying tremendous pressure and was not paying for the product. To Hopewell he was saying that Pentalift was not interested in a solution. This did Mr. DeGasperis no favours. Ultimately, his relationship imploded with both Pentalift and Hopewell, resulting in losses for Pro-Door. That said, those losses were Pro-Door's doing and I see no basis for visiting them or allowing for any kind of set-off against Pentalift's claim.

80 My findings and conclusions are based on my consideration and analysis of the following legal issues:

a) Did Pentalift provide a defective product and did it breach its warranty?

b) Was Pentalift negligent towards Pro-Door?

c) Is Pentalift liable to Pro-Door for Negligent Misrepresentation?

d) Did Pro-Door suffer damages?

e) Is Pro-Door entitled to an equitable set-off for the damages it says it suffered?

81 Before I turn to consider these issues, the admissibility of Dr. Tahir's evidence is a preliminary and pivotal issue to determine as it has a bearing on the totality of the evidence available for my consideration.

82 Pro-Door retained Dr. Tahir to provide an expert opinion on the reason for the failure of the restraints, and more specifically the cause for the gouging. He concluded that: "The gouging failure of the incident Pentalift restraints was due to a design defect." He went on to elaborate that:

> "[t]he yield strength and hardness of the incident carriage material were inadequate for the intended service loads. As such, the contact loads applied by ICC bar of trailers resulted in severe plastic deformation and wear damage of carriage plates and led to gouging failure of the incident Pentalift restraints. As such, the carriage steel material was inadequate for its intended service loads."

83 Following an expert qualification voir dire, Dr. Tahir was qualified by this court as an expert in "materials failure and metallurgy". He purported to understand his obligations to be independent and comply with his duties to the court.

84 During the voir dire, Pentalift did not take serious issue with Dr. Tahir's qualifications or with the methodology he said he followed to reach his conclusions. Even though Pentalift had reviewed Dr. Tahir's report in advance of the trial, it did not raise any concerns with any bias or reliability.

85 By the time of Pentalift's closing submissions, Pentalift asked this court to deny the admissibility of Dr. Tahir's evidence or alternatively, to give it minimal to no weight because of the serious flaws with bias and with the methodology that was actually followed. In support of its position, Pentalift drew the court's attention to the directions in R. v. Mohan, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 9 (S.C.C.), R. v. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624 (Ont. C.A.), White Burgess Langille Inman v. Abbott and Haliburton Co., 2015 SCC 23 (S.C.C.), Buctouche First Nation v. New Brunswick, [2014] N.B.J. No. 266 (N.B. C.A.), Frazer v. Haukioja, [2008] W.D.F.L. 4459 (Ont. S.C.J.), and Southcott Estates Inc. v. Toronto Catholic District School Board, 2009 CarswellOnt 494 (Ont. S.C.J.), rev'd on other grounds 2010 ONCA 310, 104 O.R. (3d) 784 (Ont. C.A.), appeal dismissed, 2012 SCC 51, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 675 (S.C.C.).

86 Pro-Door disputed Pentalift's request to have Dr. Tahir's evidence excluded. It urged the court to admit Dr. Tahir's evidence, to find it reliable, and ultimately to accept his conclusion that the RVR32s were defective.

87 Having regard for the role of experts, the criteria for the admissibility of expert evidence, and the court's ongoing obligation to be a gatekeeper of the evidentiary process and exclude prejudicial evidence throughout the trial, I have come to the conclusion that Dr. Tahir's evidence, while admissible, is only of minimal value and cannot be given any weight because of its fundamental flaws and unreliability. Since I heard his testimony, I see no prejudice to the trial to admit the evidence, particularly since I do not intend to give it much weight, if any. That said, had I appreciated the magnitude of the flaws in Dr. Tahir's opinion at the voir dire stage, I would have very likely declined to hear from him.

88 More to the point, Dr. Tahir proved to be biased and either unable or unwilling to appreciate the nature of his duties to the court. When pushed on some of the more difficult questions, he said that he followed his client's instructions. Substantively, although he purported to follow an objective methodology, he disregarded his own methodology, he accepted the limitations that were imposed on his work by Pro-Door and he did not question any of the information that was provided to him.

89 Admittedly, given the lack of any substantial resistance by the plaintiff to Dr. Tahir's evidence during the voir dire, the flaws with Dr. Tahir's overall approach were not immediately evident as he purported to understand his obligations. The methodology that he said he generally followed also seemed to be promising. The problem with Dr. Tahir was that he actually did not follow or apply the standard methodology; charitably, he took a number of shortcuts so that he could meet his client's deadline. Whether deliberately or because of inexperience, Dr. Tahir's lost his objectivity almost from the get go.

90 Regrettably, it was not until his cross-examination that the magnitude of the deficiencies became obvious. I will not repeat the admissions Dr. Tahir made about what he did not do or how he undermined his own methodology. Those were listed above in the summary of his testimony. I will however note my dismay at his defensiveness as he was confronted with each of his failures in his analysis.

91 The progression from a voir dire, where Dr. Tahir came across as objective and committed to his duty to be impartial to somebody who became defensive and lost all perspective on his role as an expert, reminded me of the direction in Bruff-Murphy v. Gunawardena, 2017 ONCA 502 (Ont. C.A.) that a trial judge's gatekeeper role is ongoing and that even after allowing an expert to testify, a trial judge must continuously assess whether the expert's testimony risks trial fairness as it unfolds. If it does, the judge must take action:

> [16] [T]he court's residual discretion to exclude prejudicial evidence is an ongoing one that continues throughout trial. It may be involved if prejudice manifests after initially admitting the evidence. Thus, . . . the court has residual discretion [under this ongoing gatekeeper function] to exclude expert evidence even after admitting it, if late in the trial prejudice emerges that was not apparent at the time of admission." [Emphasis added].

92 Of all of Dr. Tahir's omissions, I found it especially troubling that he would not question the information he received from Pro-Door, that he did not conduct any interviews whatsoever to gain an understanding of the problem at hand, that he did not seek to meet with Pentalift to gain even an elementary understanding of the RVR32 and how they were intended to operate, that he would make unsupported assumptions about Pentalift's manufacturing decisions and designs, that he would not seek out locations where the RVR32s were operating without any difficulty to compare and contrast his investigations, that he was unaware that the RVR32s met the industry mandates and requirements, and that he failed to visit Hopewell or to interview anyone at Hopewell to gain an understanding of that operation.

93 Had Dr. Tahir undertaken these essential steps, which even he said would ordinarily be part of his methodology, he might have learned that Pro-Door's complete order was for 33 systems and not 20, that the steel that Pentalift used for the manufacture of the RVR32 met the industry standards, that there were 14 systems that Pro-Door installed at Hopewell that did not exhibit any gouging, that Pentalift had manufactured and sold over 600 RVR32s and had never heard of any gouging problem, and he may have discovered that there were no reported problems with the eight systems that Pro-Door installed at another location contemporaneously with the 20 that were installed at Hopewell's Distribution Centre. He may have even learned of Mr. DeGasperis' reluctance to use the RVR32s for Hopewell and may have gained some insight as to why Mr. DeGasperis considered the order from Pentalift a bit of a "guinea pig".

94 Most significantly, on the totalilty of these discoveries, Dr. Tahir would have realized that an essential component of his analysis would have been to undertake a comparison between the 14 systems that worked, the three that had only wear and tear signs, and the three that exhibited gouging to explain what was really going on and whether there was a defect in the three systems or whether the failure might be explained by some other reason. He admitted as much when he agreed that an "apples to apples" comparison would have been one that compared the RVR32s with the gouging to the 14 RVR32s without the gouging.

95 Instead, Dr. Tahir became increasingly defensive in his answers, he justified the limitations in his analysis by indicating that Pro-Door did not give him enough time to complete his opinion, and that he did not see a reason to disbelieve what Pro-Door told him. As other possible explanations for the gouging were put to him for his consideration, Dr. Tahir argued forcefully for his particular conclusion and demonstrated an inability to engage with other probable or contributing causes for the gouging. The more he spoke, the more he was unable to provide a balanced discussion of the issues that could be relevant to causation. He clearly failed to appreciate that he was there to assist the court and not to be one more advocate for Pro-Door.

96 Having regard for the magnitude of these difficulties I am obliged to echo the trial judge's obiter by in Southcott Estates Inc.:

> [110] . . . Qualified expert witnesses are granted a right not available to lay witnesses; to give express opinions for the assistance of the court. But with this right comes the crucially important responsibility or maintaining an attitude of strict independence, and impartiality. This requires the expert's evidence to be uninfluenced as to form and content by the > exigencies of the litigation. Simply put, this means that the expert's opinion should not be influenced by the interests of the party calling him or her. Judges must be vigilant to ensure that these responsibilities are scrupulously fulfilled and when they are not, to apply appropriate sanctions.

97 Having regard for this direction and given Dr. Tahir's admission that this was the first time that he appeared before the court as an expert, I feel compelled to remind counsel of their obligations to ensure that the expert is not humiliated in the process of a cross-examination. There will always be a first time for an expert witness; that is not an impediment to testifying. But counsel have an obligation to ensure that an expert understands his or her unique role in a trial and that they are there to assist the court and to prepare that witness for testimony. This, of course, is to be distinguished from any interference with the substance of the expert's opinion, which must be his or her independent analysis and conclusion.

98 I rely on Justice Paciocco's article, "Unplugging Jukebox Testimony in an Adversarial System: Strategies for Changing the Tune on Partial Experts" (2009) 34 Queen's L.J. 565 at 600-608 to remind counsel that they must guard against: (i) selection bias (why the expert is chosen); ii. Association bias (whether the expert might demonstrate a desire to do something serviceable for his or her customer / employer); (iii) professional bias (whether an expert might be defending his or her research or own credibility); (iv) noble cause distortion (whether the expert might demonstrate a willingness to distort evidence, believing that he or she is on the side of good), and (v) dogmatism and rigidity. Any one or more of these flaws will render that expert's views unreliable and useless. When counsel fail to guard against these risks, they run the risk of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.

99 I find it especially necessary to underscore this caution in light of Dr. Tahir's admission that he deliberately modified, and thereby compromised his standard methodology because ostensibly he was given very little time to investigate and reach his conclusions. Counsel should have been vigilant over such limitations; it was incumbent on him to scrutinize the expert's efforts and ensure that his opinion was not compromised.

100 Having taken the time to review and understand Dr. Tahir's efforts, it gives me no pleasure whatsoever to have to reject his evidence, almost in its entirety and to have to underscore the various material weaknesses. I would like to believe that Dr. Tahir set out to study the issue in a bona fides manner. Clearly he did not understand that his obligations were not to Pro-Door but to the court. I am even more troubled by the time and expense that was undertaken to produce an opinion that was so fundamentally flawed and ultimately of little assistance to the court.

101 In that regard, the responsibility that Justice Paciocco speaks of in his article, extends to counsel for all parties and is engaged as early as when it is clear that a party will be seeking to lead expert evidence. Counsel should not be hesitating to raise their concerns and to engage in a comprehensive and vigorous voir dire at the outset, to prevent the risk of any trial prejudice. More to the point, they should not be calling an expert who is either biased or who is rendered useless by the excessive limitations of what he may or may not consider, as Dr. Tahir suggested occurred.

102 I turn to my consideration of the remaining issues in this trial.

a) Did Pentalift provide a defective product and did it breach its warranty?

103 My short answer to this question is "no". Pro-Door selected, ordered and received a total of 33 RVR32s. Of that order, three systems exhibited gouging. Another three were said to have significant wear and tear. The rest were fine.

104 Pro-Door had the onus to satisfy this court on a balance of probabilities that the RVR32s were defective. Apart from the evidence of Dr. Tahir, which I have rejected as biased and unreliable, there was no evidence to explain how the gouging occurred. Nobody who testified witnessed the gouging as it occurred. Mr. DeGasperis talked about trucks jamming into the restraints but he did not actually witness anything. The photos that were produced illustrated the gouging. In that sense, the court could see the outcome of something going wrong but it could not draw any conclusions on why the gouging occurred.

105 Leaving aside Dr. Tahir's conclusion about the strength of the steel and the low carbon content, much was made of Pentalift's choice of steel for the RVR32s. Mr. Rowan admitted that the strength of the steel was upgraded sometime after 2016. But he also testified that Pentalift made a number of other developmental changes to the RVR32 model.

106 On the limited evidence before me, I am not persuaded that the choice of carbon content amounted to a defect. There might have been something to that hypothesis had the gouging manifested itself across most if not all of the 20 systems that were installed at the Hopewell facility. The intensity of use of the restraint systems at Hopewell, as compared to other facilities might also offer some insight into the cause for the gouging. I cannot preclude the possibility that the RVR32s may not have been most suitable or the best choice for Hopewell. Mr. DeGasperis was certainly not sure. But failure in choice is very different from failure in a product.

107 However, having regard for the fact that there was no reported gouging on 17 of the 20 systems at Hopewell, and no problems with the eight systems at Pro-Door's other customer, if the cause for the failure were the carbon content, then all of the RVR32s at Hopewell should have exhibited some gouging, even if in variable degrees.

108 Similarly, if the explanation for the gouging lay with the intensity of use at Hopewell, as compared to other locations, then the gouging should have manifested itself uniformly across the twenty systems because the intensity of use was uniform across Hopewell's 62 loading docks. But that was not the case. Mr. DeGasperis worried that the gouging would eventually show up in the remaining 14 systems but there was no evidence that it actually occurred to any systems other than the three in question.

109 In the same vein, even if Dr. Tahir's evidence on the difference in carbon content between the RVR32s and the Rite Hite model were to be accepted as the cause for the gouging, that distinction could not explain why at least 14, if not 17 of the systems at Hopewell were gouge-free and why only three exhibited the gouging. Moreover, there was no evidence that systems such as the Rite Hite exemplar would have withstood the intensity of use at Hopewell. Although the court heard that Hopewell had some Rite Hite restraints at its Distribution Centre there was no evidence concerning their performance. And in any event, that product was disqualified as an option because of its price.

110 My concern and rejection of the carbon content as an explanation for the failure of the three out of the thirty-three RVR32s is further supported by Mr. Rowan's evidence that all 33 of the RVR32s were manufactured from the same material and the same standardized specifications and that the steel that was used met the applicable CSA standards. It stands to reason that if all 33 RVR32s were made of the same steel and that three could not withstand the pressure and exhibited the gouging but the 30 could, it could not be the steel that was defective or that was the cause for the gouging. There must be some other explanation for the problem. Pro-Door failed to advance any other probable causes.

111 Certainly, in the absence of credible and reliable evidence, it is not for the court to diagnose the problem or provide an alternate explanation for the cause for the gouging. What did become obvious from the evidence was that there could be any number of explanations for the gouging that could lie with the proper / improper installation of the systems, the accurate operation of the sensors for the particular systems, and the possible problems with damaged ICC bars. But most, if not all of these possible explanations had everything to do with the proper installation of the systems and their use, and nothing to do with Pentalift's product design. Pentalift was only the manufacturer. It did not install anything, it did not select anything, and it had no involvement whatsoever with the end-user. I therefore find it rich for Pro-Door to be putting the blame on Pentalift without any consideration for other possible causes for the problem.

112 To the extent that Mr. DeGasperis pointed to the accelerated wear and tear of the RVR32s as an additional defect or as a manifestation generally of a defect in the RVR32s, that only goes as far as to suggest to me that the RVR32s may not have been well-suited to Hopewell's needs and that perhaps Pro-Door should have selected a different product. But even on that point, there was no evidence to make such a conclusive finding.

113 As for the complaints concerning the alarms and the hooking were concerned, on the totality of the evidence, I find that those problems were addressed and were not the result of any defect. I accept Mr. Rowan's and Mr. Glass' extensive explanation regarding the adjustments that had to be made to expand the range for the hook. I also accept their evidence that by April those issues were resolved.

114 I rely on the e-mail exchanges between April and July of 2016 between Mr. Glass and Mr. DeGasperis to support that finding. Even though Mr. DeGasperis suggested that the problems resurfaced, there were no communications by Mr. DeGasperis to suggest that this allegation had any truth to it.

115 I also rely on the communications concerning the kit proposed by Mr. Glass, which was intended to address the gouging and nothing else, to conclude that by the time of those discussions, there were no other problems to address. Moreover, at least until the June 2016 communications, the complaints were focused on fixing three systems and not twenty. Accordingly, there was no evidence to support Pro-Door's claim that the RVR32s had several defects in addition to the gouging.

116 With respect to Pentalift's efforts to address Pro-Door's complaints and the difficulties they encountered at Hopewell, I found Mr. Glass' explanation that they undertook those efforts as a matter of goodwill and in recognition of Pentalift's longstanding relationship with Pro-Door entirely credible. I am unable to say the same thing for Mr. DeGasperis.

117 In contrast to Mr. Glass, although Mr. DeGasperis came across as a likable individual, I was disappointed that he was not forthright in his answers and that he let his emotions get ahead of him. Most troubling was the recognition that he did not come to court with clean hands. This came through in the competing narratives to which he admitted as he explained and compared his communications between himself and Mr. Glass on the one hand, and himself and Mr. Olsen on the other hand.

118 The communications between Mr. Glass and Mr. DeGasperis implied that Mr. DeGasperis wanted very sincerely to find a solution to the gouging. And yet, his communications with Mr. Olsen revealed a very different story, especially when he said that Pentalift was not interested in a solution. It is no wonder that Hopewell came to the point where they wanted nothing to do with Pentalift's RVR32s. I can only conclude that in an effort to mask Pro-Door's risk-taking and choice of the RVR32s, Mr. DeGasperis tried to shift the blame on others.

119 Apart from the blaming of Pentalift and Hopewell respectively and the distortion of what was really going on, Mr. DeGasperis was also untruthful with Mr. Glass and Mr. Olsen in a number of other ways. If, as he told the court he was so disappointed with his choice of the RVR32s and if he also thought that Mr. Glass' kit idea was crazy, it made no sense that he would continue the exchanges with Pentalift. I would have expected him to tell Mr. Glass that the RVR32s were not suitable or to be insisting that Pentalift replace the systems. But he did not say anything like that. His deception went further in that all the while that he was negotiating with Mr. Glass for a solution, Mr. DeGasperis was searching for another system and by the end of April there were no bona fides intentions to keep the RVR32s. That explains why Mr. Glass was so surprised to hear that the RVR32s were ripped out and replaced.

120 Similarly in his communications with Mr. Olsen, Mr. DeGasperis engaged in nothing but posturing. He tried to project Pro-Door as the hero who would either find its own solution or replace the systems altogether, when in reality Pentalift was the one that was willing to work out a solution. I believed Mr. Olsen when he said that he had no idea of Pentalift's repeated efforts to address Pro-Door's particular complaints.

121 Looking back at how Pro-Door went about selecting the RVR32s, it is very likely that Mr. DeGasperis' selection was either ill-considered or driven by budget limitations imposed by Hopewell and that this selection was the first domino to fall in a series of other poor decisions that followed.

122 But to be clear, there was no evidence to support the contention that Pentalift imposed that choice or made any kind of a recommendation. Mr. DeGasperis readily admitted that the choice was his, even if he tried to draw in one of Pentalift's employees. Having run into difficulties with his choice, rather than admit to the difficulty and address it head-on, possibly with both Pentalift and Hopewell, Mr. DeGasperis chose to tell Mr. Glass that Hopewell was refusing to pay Pro-Door and he chose to tell Hopewell that Pentalift was not interested in a solution. On that strategy, it was only a matter of time before both narratives would implode.

123 All that to say that nothing in the evidence permits me to find that the RVR32s were defective. It follows that I can also see no basis for concluding that Pentalift breached either its own warranty or the protections extended by the Sale of Goods Act, R.S.O. 1990, Chapter.S.1, S.5. (SGA).

124 Insofar as both the plaintiff and the defendant made submissions regarding the SGA, and specifically, sections 15 and 51, I make the following findings. Pentalift's own warranty was clear in its terms. If a product proved to be defective and the problems were not caused by misuse, improper installation or any other third-party causes, Pentalift reserved the right to repair or replace the equipment at issue. Having found that the RVR32s were not defective, I see no basis for a finding that Pentalift breached its warranty obligations. As I already noted, I accepted Pentalift's evidence that its efforts to assist Pro-Door were intended as a goodwill gesture and were not intended as a response to any legal obligation. There was no defect in Pentalift's product to engage Pentalift's warranty.

125 A similar analysis underlies my consideration of the protections offered by the Sale of Goods Act. Section 15 addresses the application of implied warranties. For ease of reference, I have reproduced it as follows:

> Implied conditions as to quality or fitness
>
> 15 Subject to this Act and any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows:
> 1. Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description that it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether the seller is the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods will be reasonably fit for such purpose, but in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose.
>
> 2. Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether the seller is the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods will be of merchantable quality, but if the buyer has examined the goods, there is no implied condition as regards defects that such examination ought to have revealed.
> 3. An implied warranty or condition as to quality or fitness for a particular purpose may be annexed by the usage of trade.
> 4. An express warranty or condition does not negative a warranty or condition implied by this Act unless inconsistent therewith. R.S.O. 1990, c. S.1, s. 15.

126 For Pro-Door to establish a breach by Pentalift pursuant to the Sale of Goods Act, Pro-Door would have to satisfy one of the four conditions. Beginning with section 15(1), Pro-Door would have to satisfy the court that the RVR32s were part of Pentalift's business, that Pentalift was made aware of the particular use of the RVR32s and that Pro-Door relied on Pentalift's skill and knowledge.

127 None of the evidence before the court allows Pro-Door to satisfy these requirements. Pentalift certainly manufactured the RVR32s but Pentalift had nothing to do with the Pro-Door's bid to Hopewell and Pro-Door's selection of the RVR32s. Pro-Door put in a bid for the Hopewell project and expressly selected the RVR32s months before it ever spoke to Pentalift about the order. Mr. DeGasperis talked about Scott McCorquodale's attendance at Hopewell in September and attempted to rely on that interaction to anchor the argument that Pro-Door relied on Pentalift for its expertise. However on a close read of even Mr. DeGasperis' recounting of that exchange, the questions seemed to focus more on whether Pentalift could produce so many systems. Mr. McCorquodale may have assisted with the dock measurements, but Pentalift did not assume that responsibility. Moreover, Pentalift made it clear that all such measurements were the responsibility of the dealer purchasing equipment, be that Pro-Door or any other purchaser.

128 Although Pentalift did not challenge the evidence concerning Mr. McCorquodale, even if I were to accept Mr. DeGasperis' representations, I cannot ignore the fact that the alleged interaction occurred well after Pro-Door had committed to using the RVR32s for Hopewell and well after Hopewell awarded Pro-Door the contract for Phase I. Whatever advice Mr. McCorquodale might have provided, I do not see how anything he said had any impact on Pro-Door's choice and decision to order the RVR32s for Hopewell's Distribution Centre. I also note that Ms. Ververke said nothing about such an interaction. She described this order as nothing out of the ordinary and similar to the way Pro-Door submitted other purchase orders.

129 As well, nothing in what Mr. DeGasperis said about his selection of the RVR32s actually revealed any reliance by Pro-Door on Pentalift. He said that he knew the company well, he had ordered the RVR32s for other customers, Pentalift offered good prices, and he had not encountered any difficulties. He went further to indicated that he knew he was taking a risk and that the treated this order as a "guinea pig". Mr. DeGasperis, might have been able to rely on section 15(1) had he contacted Pentalift in advance of his choice to discuss what he said was the risk he was thinking of taking, and to inquire about other options, but there was no evidence of such an action.

130 Finally, it may be useful to recall the Ontario Court of Appeal's observation in Venus Electric Ltd. v. Brevel Products Ltd., 1978 CarswellOnt 727 (Ont. C.A.), at paragraph 39, that a warranty requires that goods be reasonably suited or fitted to the purpose for which it is sold but that it need not be perfect or even the best of its kind. A warranty also does not constitute an agreement that the goods are perfectly adapted to the intended use. Mr. De Gasperis may not have chosen the best product for Hopewell's needs but that cannot amount to a breach of any implied warranty provided by the Sale of Goods Act.

131 To bring itself within the requirements of section 15(2) of the same Act, Pro-Door would have to satisfy the court, on a balance of probabilities that the RVR32s that Pentalift delivered were defective. For the reasons already discussed, Pro-Door was unable to satisfy that onus and I am unable to find on a balance of probabilities that the RVR32s that Pentalift supplied to Pro-Door had ay defect at the time of their delivery.

132 Section 15(3), which speaks of the annexation of an implied condition or condition being annexed by the usage of trade has no application to this case.

133 Section 15(4) is also of no assistance to Pro-Door. Pentalift's Agreement explicitly and unambiguously excluded the application of sections 15(1) and (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, to the Agreement as both the Warranty and page 3, provision 6 of the Quotation expressly and unambiguously excluded any express or implied warranty of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose. There is nothing in Pentalift's Agreement with Pro-Door to suggest otherwise.

134 Without a breach of section 15 of the Sale of Goods Act, Pro-Door cannot access the remedies anticipated by section 51 of the same act and I see no point in engaging in such an analysis.

b) Was Pentalift negligent towards Pro-Door?

135 On the totality of the evidence I see no basis for such a finding. Liability for negligence requires a breach of duty of care arising from a reasonably foreseeable risk of harm to one person created by the act or omission of another. This is often referred to as the "but for" test. A party asserting negligence bears the burden of showing that "but for" the negligent act or omission, the injury would have occurred.

136 Pro-Door pleaded that Pentalift owed it a duty of care in the provision of the RVR32s and repairs to same and that Pentalift breached its duty of care to Pro-Door, causing Pro-Door to suffer damages as a result. Pro-Door bears the burden of demonstrating that "but for" Pentalift's negligence, Pro-Door would not have suffered losses.

137 Pentalift relied on the following useful paragraph from Ryan v. Victoria (City), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 201 (S.C.C.) at paragraph 28 to respond to Pro-Door's claim:

> Conduct is negligent if it creates an objectively unreasonable risk of harm. To avoid liability, a person must exercise a standard of care that would be expected of an ordinary, reasonable and prudent person in the same circumstances. The measure of what is reasonable depends on the facts of each case, including the likelihood of a known or foreseeable harm, the gravity of that harm, and the burden or cost which would be incurred to prevent the injury. In addition, one may look to external indicators of reasonable conduct, such as custom, industry practice and statutory or regulatory standards.

138 In my review of the evidence, Pro-Door failed to meet the burden of demonstrating that "but for" Pentalift's negligence, Pro-Door would not have suffered the damages it alleges. On the evidence before me, the more probable answer is that "but for" Mr. DeGasperis' decision to take a risk and to treat the RVR32s as a "guinea pig", Pro-Door would not have compromised its relationship with Hopewell. Also, but for Mr. DeGasperis' two competing and contradictory narratives to Mr. Glass and Mr. Olsen respectively, he might have had a better outcome in the resolution of the gouging and any other difficulties. Mr. Glass was willing to co-operate and Mr. Olsen would have welcomed, at the very least, the consideration of Pentalift's proposed kits. Those communications were not explored because Mr. DeGasperis chose two very different approaches and strategies.

139 There was also no evidence that the Pentalift was negligent in its design or its manufacturing of the RVR32s. The particular restraints passed the internal inspection and quality control process and the materials used were all the correct composition as confirmed by the mill certificates.

140 Insofar as Pro-Door submitted that the cost of the replacement of the restraints and the labour charges for the performance of the replacements would have been within Pentalift's contemplation, there was simply no evidence to support such a contention. There was also no evidence to support the contention that Pentalift would have known that Hopewell would have been entitled to reject the RVR32s and seek replacements. Both submissions were entirely inconsistent with the reality that Pentalift was only a manufacturer of the restraint systems and had no contact with any end-users. Pro-Door selected the RVR32s for Hopewell, independent of any involvement by Pentalift. On the evidence before me, how a bid and a contract between Hopewell (Mondelez) and Pro-Door would extend to or engage Pentalift's duty of care is a mystery.

c) Is Pentalift liable to Pro-Door for Negligent Misrepresentation?

141 Here too, the short answer is "no" and here is why. For such a claim to succeed the aggrieved party must establish that:

1. There was a duty of care based on a special relationship;

2. The representation in question must be untrue, inaccurate or misleading;

3. The party making the representation must have acted negligently when he or she made the representation;

4. The party receiving the representation must have relied, in a reasonable manner, on the said negligent misrepresentation; and

5. The reliance must have been detrimental to the party that relied on the representation in that damages resulted.

See Queen v. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87 (S.C.C.) at para. 37 and Marks v. Ottawa (City), 2011 ONCA 248 (Ont. C.A.) at para. 21.

142 Pro-Door selected the RVR32s for Hopewell without Pentalift's involvement. Even if Mr. McCorquodale said anything about the RVR32s being compatible for Hopewell's needs, the evidence before the court was insufficient to ground a finding that this communication amounted to a representation on which Pro-Door relied on to make the selection. In any event, any and all communications with Pentalift regarding this specific order post-dated Pro-Door's bidding and agreement with Hopewell and Mondelez.

143 Moreover, at the risk of being repetitive, Mr. DeGasperis was never sure that the RVR32s were suitable for Hopewell's needs. He said he took a risk. Had he consulted Pentalift prior to the bid and prior to his selection of the RVR32s and had Pentalift reassured and encouraged him to go ahead with that selection, the analysis may have been different. But such a consultation did not occur.

144 Underscoring all of this was Pentalift's evidence that for all orders, Pentalift cautions its buyers to be certain of their selection. It is the buyer who is responsible to determine and take into consideration the present requirements and future plans or adverse environments for the equipment, the type of facility, the trailer design, including the trailer bed heights, ICC Bars, air ride suspension, trailer inside width and height and trailer tailgates, and the truck fleet. Pentalift was clear in its evidence that the RVR32s are not made to measure but have a standard specifications design. Moreover, it does not consider any of the noted factors and does not have any responsibility for doing so when it processes an order. Nor would it represent to any customer that it would take such features into account.

145 Specifically with respect to Pro-Door, nobody disputed Pentalift's evidence that Pro-Door was familiar with the RVR32s and had purchased it for other customers on previous occasions.

146 All of this evidence supports the conclusion that there were no representations by Pentalift specific to Pro-Door's or Hopewell's needs, much less that the representations were negligent.

d) Did Pro-Door suffer damages

147 There was no reason to dispute the costs that Pro-Door incurred to replace the RVR32s with the Metro Dock restraints. There was some disagreement over the actual labour costs. There was also substantial disagreement regarding Pro-Door's loss of the opportunity to bid on the future phases of Hopewell's replacement phases and by extension, a loss of profit.

148 That said, I do not intend to reconcile the different estimates that Pro-Door put forward on its total damages because I see no basis for holding Pentalift accountable or liable for them. Nobody really disputed that Pro-Door ran into difficulties with Hopewell over this contract. I also find it probable that Hopewell's experience with Phase I caused it to rethink its replacement strategy including its use of Pro-Door.

149 Given Hopewell's decision to go back to ground-mounted restraints and not wall mounted restraints, I am left wondering whether they too may have had doubts about the wall mounts and after trying them out in Phase I, causing them to reverted to the ground mounts for the subsequent phases. I also cannot ignore Hopewell's refusal to reveal anything about its actual budget, the significant cost differential between the RVR32s and the Rite Hite models and Mr. Olsen's express awareness of that difference, even if he did not know much about the Rite Hite option, and Mr. DeGasperis' failure to produce the bid documents. The absence of evidence on these issues raises more questions than they answer. This evidentiary void would have been problematic if I had to determine Pro-Door's loss or profit and opportunity. But in the absence of such a requirement, to make any finding would be to engage in unnecessary speculation.

150 That said, for the reasons I already discussed, I see no fault on Pentalift's part that would allow Pro-Door to claim damages from Pentalift for its losses from Hopewell.

e) Is Pro-Door entitled to an equitable set-off for the damages it says it suffered?

151 There is absolutely no basis for such a claim. The essence of Pro-Door's claim for equitable set-off is that it would be manifestly unjust for Pentalift to enforce payment for the restraints without taking into account Pro0Door's counterclaim as both claims originate from the same contract and the same products.

152 There are four criteria for equitable set-off, as outlined in Telford v. Holt [1987 CarswellAlta 188 (S.C.C.)], 1987 CanLII 18:

1. the party relying on a set-off must show some equitable ground for being protected against his adversary's demands

2. The equitable ground must go to the very root of the plaintiff's claim before a set-off will be allowed;

3. A crossclaim must be so clearly connected with the demand of the plaintiff that it would be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into consideration the crossclaim;

4. The plaintiff's claim and the crossclaim need not arise out of the same contract;

5. Unliquidated claims are on the same foot as liquidated claims.

153 Nobody disputed that Pro-Door owed Pentalift money. The dispute was over Pro-Door's counterclaim. Given my preceding findings, I am unable to identify any equitable grounds for any set-off, as claimed by Pro-Door.

154 As I already concluded, Pro-Door got into trouble with the selection and installation of the RVR32s of its own accord. Mr. DeGasperis chose a strategy of two different narratives in his communications with Mr. Glass and Mr. Olsen. To Mr. Glass, Hopewell was applying extreme pressure and giving him a very hard time. They would not even pay him for the RVR32s; in fact, whether by design or by error, Pro-Door received payment for the systems but deliberately withheld that information from Mr. Glass. To Mr. Olsen, Pentalift was the bad actor. Pentalift was the one to refuse any cooperation and refuse to propose any fix. Mr. Olsen knew nothing about Pentalift's proposed kit.

155 A party cannot come to court with unclean hands and expect the court's equity. It is of course unfortunate that Pro-Door ripped out the RVR32s and had to pay for the Metro Dock replacements. But here too, it was Mr. DeGasperis who managed the relationships in such a way that undermined the actual identification of a response to the gouging. He accused Pentalift of being greedy and money-hungry, but who was really the greedy one? Pro-Door would have been in a far better position had it allowed the kits to be installed. Had they worked, the solution would have cost everyone no more than $2,000. Had they not worked, Pro-Door may then have had a better foundation for an equitable set-off.

156 Similarly, Pro-Door would have been in a far better position to be transparent with Pentalift about Hopewell's actual directive to replace the RVR32s altogether. It would have also been a far better position if at least it would agree to return the unused systems.

157 Instead, on the facts of this case and from the time of the bid until the litigation, Pro-Door took very specific and deliberate actions. Against that reality I find it very difficult to understand why Pentalift demanding payment, without a set-off would be unjust.

CONCLUSION

158 In light of my findings and conclusions, Pro-Door's counterclaim is dismissed in its entirely. Pentalift is entitled to judgment on the following terms:

a) Payment of the sum of $67,884.59 by Pro-Door to Pentalift for the outstanding invoices;

b) Payment of pre-judgment interest from Pro-Door on each outstanding invoice from the 30 th day of the month following the date of each invoice at the rate of 24% per year; and

c) Post-judgment interest in accordance with the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, as amended.

159 On the subject of costs, having received the parties' respective bills of costs and having regard for the plaintiff's success, I fix costs at $38,000, inclusive of disbursements and applicable taxes and payable within 30 days from the date of this judgment.

160 I have reduced the plaintiff's partial indemnity claim by approximately $7,500 in recognition of the proportionality between the amount claimed and the fees incurred as well as the number of people who worked on the file. I find some duplication of effort all along. While the counterclaim was certainly significant the issues were straightforward and should not have required nearly the number of hours for the tasks at hand.

161 Judgment in favour of Pentalift is to issue accordingly.

Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed.

Jurisdiction of Supreme Court of Canada to stay implementation of regulations pending appeal — Distinction between suspension of and exemption from regulations irrelevant — Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20 — Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, s. 65.1 — Can R. 27.

Applicants challenged the constitutional validity of the Tobacco Products Control Act, which regulated the advertisement of tobacco products and health warnings on those products. The Court of Appeal found the legislation to be constitutional. Before a decision on applicants' leave applications in the main action was made, applicants applied to the Supreme Court of Canada for a stay from compliance with the new packaging requirements pursuant to s. 65.1 of the Supreme Court Act, or, in the event that leave was granted, pursuant to R. 27. A preliminary issue of jurisdiction was raised. Held, the Court had jurisdiction to grant such relief but the applications for stays were dismissed. The phrase "other relief" in R. 27 was broad enough to permit the Court to defer enforcement of regulations that were not in existence when the appeal judgment was rendered, and could apply even though leave to appeal was not yet granted. S. 65.1 was to be interpreted as conferring the same broad powers as R. 27. The Court had to be able to intervene not only against the direct dictates of a judgment, but also against its effects. Even if the relief requested by applicants was for the suspension of the regulation rather than for an exemption from it, jurisdiction to grant such relief existed, as a distinction between such cases was only to be made after jurisdiction was otherwise established.
Application for stay of compliance with new tobacco packaging regulations — Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20.

The Court of Appeal found the legislation to be constitutional. Before a decision on applicants' leave applications in the main action was made, applicants applied to the Supreme Court of Canada for a stay from compliance with the new packaging requirements. Held, the applications for stays were dismissed. The same test was to be applied to applications for interlocutory injunctions and stays in both private law and Charter cases. The case clearly raised serious questions of law and the expenditures which the new regulations required would impose irreparable harm on applicants if the stay were denied and the main action were successful. However, in determining the balance of convenience, any economic hardship suffered by applicants could be avoided by passing it on to tobacco purchasers. Public interest had to be taken into account. Public interest consideration carried less weight in exemption cases than in suspension cases, the present case being of the latter type. The only possible public interest in continuing current packaging requirements was that the price of cigarettes for smokers would not increase. This increase would be slight and would carry little weight when balanced against the undeniable public interest in health protection from medical problems attributable to smoking.

The judgment of the Court on the applications for interlocutory relief was delivered by Sopinka and Cory JJ.:

I. Factual Background

1 These applications for relief from compliance with certain Tobacco Products Control Regulations, amendment , SOR/93-389 as interlocutory relief are ancillary to a larger challenge to regulatory legislation which will soon be heard by this Court.

2 The Tobacco Products Control Act , R.S.C., 1985, c. 14 (4th Supp.), S.C. 1988, c. 20, came into force on January 1, 1989. The purpose of the Act is to regulate the advertisement of tobacco products and the health warnings which must be placed upon tobacco products.

3 The first part of the Tobacco Products Control Act , particularly ss. 4 to 8, prohibits the advertisement of tobacco products and any other form of activity designed to encourage their sale. Section 9 regulates the labelling of tobacco products, and provides that health messages must be carried on all tobacco packages in accordance with the regulations passed pursuant to the Act.

4 Sections 11 to 16 of the Act deal with enforcement and provide for the designation of tobacco product inspectors who are granted search and seizure powers. Section 17 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations under the Act. Section 17(f) authorizes the Governor in Council to adopt regulations prescribing "the content, position, configuration, size and prominence" of the mandatory health messages. Section 18(1)(b) of the Act indicates that infringements may be prosecuted by indictment, and upon conviction provides for a penalty by way of a fine not to exceed $100,000, imprisonment for up to one year, or both.

5 Each of the applicants challenged the constitutional validity of the Tobacco Products Control Act on the grounds that it is ultra vires the Parliament of Canada and invalid as it violates s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms . The two cases were heard together and decided on common evidence.

6 On July 26, 1991, Chabot J. of the Quebec Superior Court granted the applicants' motions, [1991] R.J.Q. 2260, 82 D.L.R. (4th) 449 , finding that the Act was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada and that it contravened the Charter . The respondent appealed to the Quebec Court of Appeal. Before the Court of Appeal rendered judgment, the applicants applied to this court for interlocutory relief in the form of an order that they would not have to comply with certain provisions of the Act for a period of 60 days following judgment in the Court of Appeal.

7 Up to that point, the applicants had complied with all provisions in the Tobacco Products Control Act . However, under the Act, the complete prohibition on all point of sale advertising was not due to come into force until December 31, 1992. The applicants estimated that it would take them approximately 60 days to dismantle all of their advertising displays in stores. They argued that, with the benefit of a Superior Court judgment declaring the Act unconstitutional, they should not be required to take any steps to dismantle their displays until such time as the Court of Appeal might eventually hold the legislation to be valid.

On the motion the Court of Appeal held that the penalties for non-compliance with the ban on point of sale advertising could not be enforced against the applicants until such time as the Court of Appeal had released its decision on the merits. The court refused, however, to stay the enforcement of the provisions for a period of 60 days following a judgment validating the Act.

8 On January 15, 1993, the Court of Appeal for Quebec, [1993] R.J.Q. 375, 102 D.L.R. (4th) 289 , allowed the respondent's appeal, Brossard J.A. dissenting in part. The Court unanimously held that the Act was not ultra vires the government of Canada. The Court of Appeal accepted that the Act infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter but found, Brossard J.A. dissenting on this aspect, that it was justified under s. 1 of the Charter . Brossard J.A. agreed with the majority with respect to the requirement of unattributed package warnings (that is to say the warning was not to be attributed to the Federal Government) but found that the ban on advertising was not justified under s. 1 of the Charter . The applicants filed an application for leave to appeal the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal to this Court.

9 On August 11, 1993, the Governor in Council published amendments to the regulations dated July 21, 1993, under the Act: Tobacco Products Control Regulations, amendment , SOR/93-389. The amendments stipulate that larger, more prominent health warnings must be placed on all tobacco products packets, and that these warnings can no longer be attributed to Health and Welfare Canada. The packaging changes must be in effect within one year.

10 According to affidavits filed in support of the applicant's motion, compliance with the new regulations would require the tobacco industry to redesign all of its packaging and to purchase thousands of rotogravе cylinders and embossing dies. These changes would take close to a year to effect, at a cost to the industry of about $30,000,000.

11 Before a decision on their leave applications in the main actions had been made, the applicants brought these motions for a stay pursuant to s. 65.1 of the Supreme Court Act , R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26 (ad. by S.C. 1990, c. 8, s. 40) or, in the event that leave was granted, pursuant to r. 27 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada , SOR/83-74. The applicants seek to stay "the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal delivered on January 15, 1993", but "only insofar as that judgment validates sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 10 of [the new regulations]". In effect, the applicants ask to be released from any obligation to comply with the new packaging requirements until the disposition of the main actions. The applicants further request that the stays be granted for a period of 12 months from the dismissal of the leave applications or from a decision of this Court confirming the validity of Tobacco Products Control Act .

12 The applicants contend that the stays requested are necessary to prevent their being required to incur considerable irrecoverable expenses as a result of the new regulations even though this Court may eventually find the enabling legislation to be constitutionally invalid.

13 The applicants' motions were heard by this Court on October 4. Leave to appeal the main actions was granted on October 14.

II. Relevant Statutory Provisions

Tobacco Products Control Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 14 (4th Supp.), S.C. 1988, c. 20, s. 3:

> 3. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
>
> (a) to protect the health of Canadians in the light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
>
> (b) to protect young persons and others, to the extent that is reasonable in a free and democratic society, from inducements to use tobacco products and consequent dependence on them; and
> (c) to enhance public awareness of the hazards of tobacco use by ensuring the effective communication of pertinent information to consumers of tobacco products.

Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, s. 65.1 (ad. S.C. 1990, c. 8, s. 40):

> 65.1 The Court or a judge may, on the request of a party who has filed a notice of application for leave to appeal, order that proceedings be stayed with respect to the judgment from which leave to appeal is being sought, on such terms as to the Court or the judge seem just.

Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada, SOR/83-74, s. 27:

> 27. Any party against whom judgment has been given, or an order made, by the Court or any other court, may apply to the Court for a stay of execution or other relief against such a judgment or order, and the Court may give such relief upon such terms as may be just.

III. Courts Below

17 In order to place the applications for the stay in context it is necessary to review briefly the decisions of the courts below.

18 Chabot J. concluded that the dominant characteristic of the Tobacco Products Control Act was the control of tobacco advertising and that the protection of public health was only an incidental objective of the Act. Chabot J. characterized the Tobacco Products Control Act as a law regulating advertising of a particular product, a matter within provincial legislative competence.

19 Chabot J. found that, with respect to s. 2(b) of the Charter , the activity prohibited by the Act was a protected activity, and that the notices required by the Regulations violated that Charter guarantee. He further held that the evidence demonstrated that the objective of reducing the level of consumption of tobacco products was of sufficient importance to warrant legislation restricting freedom of expression, and that the legislative objectives identified by Parliament to reduce tobacco use were a pressing and substantial concern in a free and democratic society.

20 However, in his view, the Act did not minimally impair freedom of expression, as it did not restrict itself to protecting young people from inducements to smoke, or limit itself to lifestyle advertising. Chabot J. found that the evidence submitted by the respondent in support of its contention that adver tising bans decrease consumption was unreliable and without probative value because it failed to demonstrate that any ban of tobacco advertising would be likely to bring about a reduction of tobacco consumption. Therefore, the respondent had not demonstrated that an advertising ban restricted freedom of expression as little as possible. Chabot J. further concluded that the evidence of a rational connection between the ban of Canadian advertising and the objective of reducing overall consumption of tobacco was deficient, if not non-existent. He held that the Act was a form of censorship and social engineering which was incompatible with a free and democratic society and could not be justified.

Court of Appeal (on the application for a stay)

21 In deciding whether or not to exercise its broad power under art. 523 of the Code of Civil Procedure of Québec to "make any order necessary to safeguard the rights of the parties", the Court of Appeal made the following observation on the nature of the relief requested:

> But what is at issue here (if the Act is found to be constitutionally valid) is the suspension of the legal effect of part of the Act and the legal duty to comply with it for 60 days, and the suspension, as well, of the power of the appropriate public authorities to enforce the Act. To suspend or delay the effect or the enforcement of a valid act of the legislature, particularly one purporting to relate to the protection of public health or safety is a serious matter. The courts should not lightly limit or > delay the implementation or enforcement of valid legislation where the legislature has brought that legislation into effect. To do so would be to intrude into the legislative and the executive spheres. [Emphasis in original.]

The Court made a partial grant of the relief sought as follows:

> Since the letters of the Department of Health and Welfare and appellants' contestation both suggest the possibility that the applicants may be prosecuted under Sec. 5 after December 31, 1992 whether or not judgment has been rendered on these appeals by that date, it seems reasonable to order the suspension of enforcement under Sec. 5 of the Act until judgment has been rendered by this Court on the present appeals. There is, after all, a serious issue as to the validity of the Act, and it would be unfairly onerous to require the applicants to incur substantial expense in dismantling these point of sale displays until we have resolved that issue.
> We see no basis, however, for ordering a stay of the coming into effect of the Act for 60 days following our judgment on the appeals.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Indeed, given the public interest aspect of the Act, which purports to be concerned with the protection of public health, if the Act were found to be valid, there is excellent reason why its effect and enforcement should not be suspended (A.G. of Manitoba v. Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd., [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 , 127, 135). [Emphasis in original.]

Court of Appeal (on the validity of the legislation), [1993] R.J.Q. 375, 102 D.L.R. (4th) 289

1. LeBel J.A. (for the majority)

22 LeBel J.A. characterized the Tobacco Products Control Act as legislation relating to public health. He also found that it was valid as legislation enacted for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

23 LeBel J.A. applied the criteria set out in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401 , and concluded that the Act satisfied the "national concern" test and could properly rest on a purely theoretical, unproven link between tobacco advertising and the overall consumption of tobacco.

24 LeBel J.A. agreed with Brossard J.A. that the Act infringed freedom of expression pursuant to s. 2(b) of the Charter but found that it was justified under s. 1 of the Charter . LeBel J.A. concluded that Chabot J. erred in his findings of fact in failing to recognize that the rational connection and minimal impairment branches of the Oakes test have been attenuated by later decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. He found that the s. 1 test was satisfied since there was a possibility that prohibiting tobacco advertising might lead to a reduction in tobacco consumption, based on the mere existence of a [Translation] "body of opinion" favourable to the adoption of a ban. Further he found that the Act appeared to be consistent with minimal impairment as it did not prohibit consumption, did not prohibit foreign advertising and did not preclude the possibility of obtaining information about tobacco products.

2. Brossard J.A. (dissenting in part)

25 Brossard J.A. agreed with LeBel J.A. that the Tobacco Products Control Act should be characterized as public health legislation and that the Act satisfied the "national concern" branch of the peace, order and good government power.

26 However, he did not think that the violation of s. 2(b) of the Charter could be justified. He reviewed the evidence and found that it did not demonstrate the existence of a connection or even the possibility of a connection between an advertising ban and the use of tobacco. It was his opinion that it must be shown on a balance of probabilities that it was at least possible that the goals sought would be achieved. He also disagreed that the Act met the minimal impairment requirement since in his view the Act's objectives could be met by restricting advertising without the need for a total prohibition.

IV. Jurisdiction

27 A preliminary question was raised as to this Court's jurisdiction to grant the relief requested by the applicants. Both the Attorney General of Canada and the interveners on the stay (several health organizations, i.e., the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, and Physicians for a Smoke-Free Canada) argued that this Court lacks jurisdiction to order a stay of execution or of the proceedings which would relieve the applicants of the obligation of complying with the new regulations. Several arguments were advanced in support of this position.

28 First, the Attorney General argued that neither the old nor the new regulations dealing with the health messages were in issue before the lower courts and, as such, the applicants' requests for a stay truly cloaks requests to have this Court exercise an original jurisdiction over the matter. Second, he contended that the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal is not subject to execution given that it only declared that the Act was intra vires s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and justified under s. 1 of the Charter . Because the lower court decision amounts to a declaration, there is, therefore, no "proceeding" that can be stayed. Finally, the Attorney General characterized the applicants' requests as being requests for a suspension by anticipation of the 12-month delay in which the new regulations will become effective so that the applicants can continue to sell tobacco products for an extended period in packages containing the health warnings required by the present regulations. He claimed that this Court has no jurisdiction to suspend the operation of the new regulations.

29 The interveners supported and elaborated on these submissions. They also submitted that r. 27 could not apply because leave to appeal had not been granted. In any event, they argued that the words "or other relief" are not broad enough to permit this Court to defer enforcement of regulations that were not even in existence at the time the appeal judgment was rendered.

30 The powers of the Supreme Court of Canada to grant relief in this kind of proceeding are contained in s. 65.1 of the Supreme Court Act and r. 27 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada .

Supreme Court Act

> 65.1 The Court or a judge may, on the request of a party who has filed a notice of application for leave to appeal, order that proceedings be stayed with respect to the judgment from which leave to appeal is being sought, on such terms as to the Court or the judge seem just.

Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada

> 27. Any party against whom judgment has been given, or an order made, by the Court or any other court, may apply to the Court for a stay of execution or other relief against such a judgment or order, and the Court may give such relief upon such terms as may be just.

33 Rule 27 and its predecessor have existed in substantially the same form since at least 1888 (see Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada , 1888, General Order No. 85(17)). Its broad language reflects the language of s. 97 of the Act whence the Court derives its rule-making power. Subsection (1)(a) of that section provides that the rules may be enacted:

> 97. ...
> > (a) for regulating the procedure of and in the Court and the bringing of cases before it from courts appealed from or otherwise, and for the effectual execution and working of this Act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof;

Although the point is now academic, leave to appeal having been granted, we would not read into the rule the limitations suggested by the interveners. Neither the words of the rule nor s. 97 contain such limitations. In our opinion, in interpreting the language of the rule, regard should be had to its purpose, which is best expressed in the terms of the empowering section: to facilitate the "bringing of cases" before the Court "for the effectual execution and working of this Act". To achieve its purpose the rule can neither be limited to cases in which leave to appeal has already been granted nor be interpreted narrowly to apply only to an order stopping or arresting execution of the Court's process by a third party or freezing the judicial proceeding which is the subject matter of the judgment in appeal. Examples of the former, traditionally described as stays of execution, are contained in the subsections of s. 65 of the Act which have been held to be limited to preventing the intervention of a third party such as a sheriff but not the enforcement of an order directed to a party. See Keable v. Attorney General (Can.), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 135 . The stopping or freezing of all proceedings is traditionally referred to as a stay of proceedings. See Battle Creek Toasted Corn Flake Co. v. Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co. (1924), 55 O.L.R. 127 (C.A.) . Such relief can be granted pursuant to this Court's powers in r. 27 or s. 65.1 of the Act.

34 Moreover, we cannot agree that the adoption of s. 65.1 in 1992 (S.C. 1990, c. 8, s. 40) was intended to limit the Court's powers under r. 27. The purpose of that amendment was to enable a single judge to exercise the jurisdiction to grant stays in circumstances in which, before the amendment, a stay could be granted by the Court. Section 65.1 should, therefore, be interpreted to confer the same broad powers that are included in r. 27.

35 In light of the foregoing and bearing in mind in particular the language of s. 97 of the Act we cannot agree with the first two points raised by the Attorney General that this Court is unable to grant a stay as requested by the applicants. We are of the view that the Court is empowered, pursuant to both s. 65.1 and r. 27, not only to grant a stay of execution and of proceedings in the traditional sense, but also to make any order that preserves matters between the parties in a state that will prevent prejudice as far as possible pending resolution by the Court of the controversy, so as to enable the Court to render a meaningful and effective judgment. The Court must be able to intervene not only against the direct dictates of the judgment but also against its effects. This means that the Court must have jurisdiction to enjoin conduct on the part of a party in reliance on the judgment which, if carried out, would tend to negate or diminish the effect of the judgment of this Court. In this case, the new regulations constitute conduct under a law that has been declared constitutional by the lower courts.

36 This, in our opinion, is the view taken by this Court in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 594 . The appellant Labatt, in circumstances similar to those in this case, sought to suspend enforcement of regulations which were attacked by it in an action for a declaration that the regulations were inapplicable to Labatt's product. The Federal Court of Appeal reversed a lower court finding in favour of Labatt. Labatt applied for a stay pending an appeal to this Court. Although the parties had apparently agreed to the terms of an order suspending further proceedings, Laskin C.J. dealt with the issue of jurisdiction, an issue that apparently was contested notwithstanding the agreement. The Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, determined that the Court was empowered to make an order suspending the enforcement of the impugned regulation by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At page 600, Laskin C.J. responded as follows to arguments advanced on the traditional approach to the power to grant a stay:

> It was contended that the Rule relates to judgments or orders of this Court and not to judgments or orders of the Court appealed from. Its formulation appears to me to be inconsistent with such a limitation. Nor do I think that the position of the respondent that there is no judgment against the appellant to be stayed is a tenable one. Even if it be so, there is certainly an order against the appellant. Moreover, I do not think that the words of Rule 126, authorizing this Court to grant relief against an adverse order, should be read so narrowly as to invite only intervention directly against the order and not against its effect while an appeal against it is pending in this Court. I am of the opinion, therefore, that the appellant is entitled to apply for interlocutory relief against the operation of the order dismissing its declaratory action, and that this Court may grant relief on such terms as may be just. [Emphasis added.]

37 While the above passage appears to answer the submission of the respondents on this motion that Labatt was distinguishable because the Court acted on a consent order, the matter was put beyond doubt by the following additional statement of Laskin C.J. at p. 601:

> Although I am of the opinion that Rule 126 applies to support the making of an order of the kind here agreed to by counsel for the parties, I would not wish it to be taken that this Court is otherwise without power to prevent proceedings pending before it from being aborted by unilateral action by one of the parties pending final determination of an appeal.

Indeed, an examination of the factums filed by the parties to the motion in Labatt reveals that while it was agreed that the dispute would be resolved by an application for a declaration, it was not agreed that pending resolution of the dispute the enforcement of the regulations would be stayed.

38 In our view, this Court has jurisdiction to grant the relief requested by the applicants. This is the case even if the applicants' requests for relief are for "suspension" of the regulation rather than "exemption" from it. To hold otherwise would be inconsistent with this Court's finding in Manitoba (Attorney General) v. Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd., [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 . In that case, the distinction between "suspension" and "exemption" cases is made only after jurisdiction has been otherwise established and the public interest is being weighed against the interests of the applicant seeking the stay of proceedings. While "suspension" is a power that, as is stressed below, must be exercised sparingly, this is achieved by applying the criteria in Metropolitan Stores strictly and not by a restrictive interpretation of this Court's jurisdiction. Therefore, the final argument of the Attorney General on the issue of jurisdiction also fails.

39 Finally, if jurisdiction under s. 65.1 of the Act and r. 27 were wanting, we would be prepared to find jurisdiction in s. 24(1) of the Charter . A Charter remedy should not be defeated due to a deficiency in the ancillary procedural powers of the Court to preserve the rights of the parties pending a final resolution of constitutional rights.

V. Grounds for Stay of Proceedings

40 The applicants rely upon the following grounds:

1. The challenged Tobacco Products Control Regulations, amendment were promulgated pursuant to ss. 9 and 17 of the Tobacco Products Control Act , S.C. 1988, c. 20.

2. The applicants have applied to this Court for leave to appeal a judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal dated January 15, 1993. The Court of Appeal overturned a decision of the Quebec Superior Court declaring certain sections of the Act to be beyond the powers of the Parliament of Canada and an unjustifiable violation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms .

3. The effect of the new regulations is such that the applicants will be obliged to incur substantial unrecoverable expenses in carrying out a complete redesign of all its packaging before this Court will have ruled on the constitutional validity of the enabling legislation and, if this Court restores the judgment of the Superior Court, will incur the same expenses a second time should they wish to restore their packages to the present design.

4. The tests for granting of a stay are met in this case:

(i) There is a serious constitutional issue to be determined.

(ii) Compliance with the new regulations will cause irreparable harm.

(iii) The balance of convenience, taking into account the public interest, favours retaining the status quo until this court has disposed of the legal issues.

VI. Analysis

41 The primary issue to be decided on these motions is whether the applicants should be granted the interlocutory relief they seek. The applicants are only entitled to this relief if they can satisfy the test laid down in Manitoba (Attorney General) v. Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd., supra . If not, the applicants will have to comply with the new regulations, at least until such time as a decision is rendered in the main actions.

A. Interlocutory Injunctions, Stays of Proceedings and the Charter

42 The applicants ask this Court to delay the legal effect of regulations which have already been enacted and to prevent public authorities from enforcing them. They further seek to be protected from enforcement of the regulations for a 12-month period even if the enabling legislation is eventually found to be constitutionally valid. The relief sought is significant and its effects far reaching. A careful balancing process must be undertaken.

43 On one hand, courts must be sensitive to and cautious of making rulings which deprive legislation enacted by elected officials of its effect.

44 On the other hand, the Charter charges the courts with the responsibility of safeguarding fundamental rights. For the courts to insist rigidly that all legislation be enforced to the letter until the moment that it is struck down as unconstitutional might in some instances be to condone the most blatant violation of Charter rights. Such a practice would undermine the spirit and purpose of the Charter and might encourage a government to prolong unduly final resolution of the dispute.

45 Are there, then, special considerations or tests which must be applied by the courts when Charter violations are alleged and the interim relief which is sought involves the execution and enforceability of legislation?

46 Generally, the same principles should be applied by a court whether the remedy sought is an injunction or a stay. In Metropolitan Stores , at p. 127, Beetz J. expressed the position in these words:

> A stay of proceedings and an interlocutory injunction are remedies of the same nature. In the absence of a different test prescribed by statute, they have sufficient characteristics in common to be governed by the same rules and the courts have rightly tended to apply to the granting of interlocutory stay the principles which they follow with respect to interlocutory injunctions.

47 We would add only that here the applicants are requesting both interlocutory (pending disposition of the appeal) and interim (for a period of one year following such disposition) relief. We will use the broader term "interlocutory relief" to describe the hybrid nature of the relief sought. The same principles apply to both forms of relief.

48 Metropolitan Stores adopted a three-stage test for courts to apply when considering an application for either a stay or an interlocutory injunction. First, a preliminary assessment must be made of the merits of the case to ensure that there is a serious question to be tried. Secondly, it must be determined whether the applicant would suffer irreparable harm if the application were refused. Finally, an assessment must be made as to which of the parties would suffer greater harm from the granting or refusal of the remedy pending a decision on the merits. It may be helpful to consider each aspect of the test and then apply it to the facts presented in these cases.

B. The Strength of the Plaintiff's Case

49 Prior to the decision of the House of Lords in American Cyanamid Co. v. Ethicon Ltd., [1975] A.C. 396 , an applicant for interlocutory relief was required to demonstrate a "strong prima facie case" on the merits in order to satisfy the first test. In American Cyanamid , however, Lord Diplock stated that an applicant need no longer demonstrate a strong prima facie case. Rather it would suffice if he or she could satisfy the court that "the claim is not frivolous or vexatious; in other words, that there is a serious question to be tried". The American Cyanamid standard is now generally accepted by the Canadian courts, subject to the occasional reversion to a stricter standard: see Robert J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (2nd ed. 1992), at pp. 2-13 to 2-20.

50 In Metropolitan Stores , Beetz J. advanced several reasons why the American Cyanamid test rather than any more stringent review of the merits is appropriate in Charter cases. These included the difficulties involved in deciding complex factual and legal issues based upon the limited evidence available in an interlocutory proceeding, the impracticality of undertaking a s. 1 analysis at that stage, and the risk that a tentative determination on the merits would be made in the absence of complete pleadings or prior to the notification of any Attorneys General.

51 The respondent here raised the possibility that the current status of the main action required the applicants to demonstrate something more than "a serious question to be tried." The respondent relied upon the following dicta of this Court in Laboratoire Pentagone Ltée v. Parke, Davis & Co., [1968] S.C.R. 269 , at p. 272:

> The burden upon the appellant is much greater than it would be if the injunction were interlocutory. In such a case the Court must consider the balance of convenience as between the parties, because the matter has not yet come to trial. In the present case we are being asked to suspend the operation of a judgment of the Court of Appeal, delivered after full consideration of the merits. It is not sufficient to justify such an order being made to urge that the impact of the injunction upon the appellant would be greater than the impact of its suspension upon the respondent.

To the same effect were the comments of Kelly J.A. in Adrian Messenger Services v. The Jockey Club Ltd. (No. 2) (1972), 2 O.R. 619 (C.A.) , at p. 620:

> Unlike the situation prevailing before trial, where the competing allegations of the parties are unresolved, on an application for an interim injunction pending an appeal from the dismissal of the action the defendant has a judgment of the Court in its favour. Even conceding the ever-present possibility of the reversal of that judgment on appeal, it will in my view be in a comparatively rare case that the Court will interfere to confer upon a plaintiff, even on an interim basis, the very right to which the trial Court has held he is not entitled.

And, most recently, of Philp J. in Bear Island Foundation v. Ontario (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 574 (H.C.) , at p. 576:

> While I accept that the issue of title to these lands is a serious issue, it has been resolved by trial and by appeal. The reason for the Supreme Court of Canada granting leave is unknown and will not be known until they hear the appeal and render judgment. There is not before me at this time, therefore, a serious or substantial issue to be tried. It has already been tried and appealed. No attempt to stop harvesting was made by the present plaintiffs before trial, nor before the appeal before the Court of Appeal of Ontario. The issue is no longer an issue at trial.

52 According to the respondent, such statements suggest that once a decision has been rendered on the merits at trial, either the burden upon an applicant for interlocutory relief increases, or the applicant can no longer obtain such relief. While it might be possible to distinguish the above authorities on the basis that in the present case the trial judge agreed with the applicant's position, it is not necessary to do so. Whether or not these statements reflect the state of the law in private applications for interlocutory relief, which may well be open to question, they have no application in Charter cases.

53 The Charter protects fundamental rights and freedoms. The importance of the interests which, the applicants allege, have been adversely affected require every court faced with an alleged Charter violation to review the matter carefully. This is so even when other courts have concluded that no Charter breach has occurred. Furthermore, the complex nature of most constitutional rights means that a motions court will rarely have the time to engage in the requisite extensive analysis of the merits of the applicant's claim. This is true of any application for interlocutory relief whether or not a trial has been conducted. It follows that we are in complete agreement with the conclusion of Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores , at p. 128, that "the American Cyanamid 'serious question' formulation is sufficient in a constitutional case where, as indicated below in these reasons, the public interest is taken into consideration in the balance of convenience."

54 What then are the indicators of "a serious question to be tried"? There are no specific requirements which must be met in order to satisfy this test. The threshold is a low one. The judge on the application must make a preliminary assessment of the merits of the case. The decision of a lower court judge on the merits of the Charter claim is a relevant but not necessarily conclusive indication that the issues raised in an appeal are serious: see Metropolitan Stores, supra , at p. 150. Similarly, a decision by an appellate court to grant leave on the merits indicates that serious questions are raised, but a refusal of leave in a case which raises the same issues cannot automatically be taken as an indication of the lack of strength of the merits.

55 Once satisfied that the application is neither vexatious nor frivolous, the motions judge should proceed to consider the second and third tests, even if of the opinion that the plaintiff is unlikely to succeed at trial. A prolonged examination of the merits is generally neither necessary nor desirable.

56 Two exceptions apply to the general rule that a judge should not engage in an extensive review of the merits. The first arises when the result of the interlocutory motion will in effect amount to a final determination of the action. This will be the case either when the right which the applicant seeks to protect can only be exercised immediately or not at all, or when the result of the application will impose such hardship on one party as to remove any potential benefit from proceeding to trial. Indeed Lord Diplock modified the American Cyanamid principle in such a situation in N.W.L. Ltd. v. Woods, [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1294 , at p. 1307:

> Where, however, the grant or refusal of the interlocutory injunction will have the practical effect of putting an end to the action because the harm that will have been already caused to the losing party by its grant or its refusal is complete and of a kind for which money cannot constitute any worthwhile recompense, the degree of likelihood that the plaintiff would have succeeded in establishing his right to an injunction if the action had gone to trial is a factor to be brought into the balance by the judge in weighing the risks that injustice may result from his deciding the application one way rather than the other.

Cases in which the applicant seeks to restrain picketing may well fall within the scope of this exception. Several cases indicate that this exception is already applied to some extent in Canada.

57 In Trieger v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp. (1988), 54 D.L.R. (4th) 143 (Ont. H.C.) , the leader of the Green Party applied for an interlocutory mandatory injunction allowing him to participate in a party leaders' debate to be televised within a few days of the hearing. The applicant's only real interest was in being permitted to participate in the debate, not in any subsequent declaration of his rights. Campbell J. refused the application, stating at p. 152:

> This is not the sort of relief that should be granted on an interlocutory application of this kind. The legal issues involved are complex and I am not satisfied that the applicant has demonstrated there is a serious issue to be tried in the sense of a case with enough legal merit to justify the extraordinary intervention of this court in making the order sought without any trial at all. [Emphasis added.]

58 In Tremblay v. Daigle, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 530 , the appellant Daigle was appealing an interlocutory injunction granted by the Quebec Superior Court enjoining her from having an abortion. In view of the advanced state of the appellant's pregnancy, this Court went beyond the issue of whether or not the interlocutory injunction should be discharged and immediately rendered a decision on the merits of the case.

59 The circumstances in which this exception will apply are rare. When it does, a more extensive review of the merits of the case must be undertaken. Then when the second and third stages of the test are considered and applied the anticipated result on the merits should be borne in mind.

60 The second exception to the American Cyanamid prohibition on an extensive review of the merits arises when the question of constitutionality presents itself as a simple question of law alone. This was recognized by Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores , at p. 133:

> There may be rare cases where the question of constitutionality will present itself as a simple question of law alone which can be finally settled by a motion judge. A theoretical example which comes to mind is one where Parliament or a legislature would purport to pass a law imposing the beliefs of a state religion. Such a law would violate s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms , could not possibly be saved under s. 1 of the Charter and might perhaps be struck down right away; see Attorney General of Quebec v. Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 66 , at p. 88. It is trite to say that these cases are exceptional.

A judge faced with an application which falls within the extremely narrow confines of this second exception need not consider the second or third tests since the existence of irreparable harm or the location of the balance of convenience are irrelevant inasmuch as the constitutional issue is finally determined and a stay is unnecessary.

61 The suggestion has been made in the private law context that a third exception to the American Cyanamid "serious question to be tried" standard should be recognized in cases where the factual record is largely settled prior to the application being made. Thus in Dialadex Communications Inc. v. Crammond (1987), 34 D.L.R. (4th) 392 (Ont. H.C.) , at p. 396, it was held that:

> Where the facts are not substantially in dispute, the plaintiffs must be able to establish a strong prima facie case and must show that they will suffer irreparable harm if the injunction is not granted. If there are facts in dispute, a lesser standard must be met. In that case, the plaintiffs must show that their case is not a frivolous one and there is a substantial question to be tried, and that, on the balance of convenience, an injunction should be granted.

To the extent that this exception exists at all, it should not be applied in Charter cases. Even if the facts upon which the Charter breach is alleged are not in dispute, all of the evidence upon which the s. 1 issue must be decided may not be before the motions court. Furthermore, at this stage an appellate court will not normally have the time to consider even a complete factual record properly. It follows that a motions court should not attempt to undertake the careful analysis required for a consideration of s. 1 in an interlocutory proceeding.

C. Irreparable Harm

62 Beetz J. determined in Metropolitan Stores , at p. 128, that "[t]he second test consists in deciding whether the litigant who seeks the interlocutory injunction would, unless the injunction is granted, suffer irreparable harm". The harm which might be suffered by the respondent, should the relief sought be granted, has been considered by some courts at this stage. We are of the opinion that this is more appropriately dealt with in the third part of the analysis. Any alleged harm to the public interest should also be considered at that stage.

63 At this stage the only issue to be decided is whether a refusal to grant relief could so adversely affect the applicants' own interests that the harm could not be remedied if the eventual decision on the merits does not accord with the result of the interlocutory application.

64 "Irreparable" refers to the nature of the harm suffered rather than its magnitude. It is harm which either cannot be quantified in monetary terms or which cannot be cured, usually because one party cannot collect damages from the other. Examples of the former include instances where one party will be put out of business by the court's decision (R.L. Crain Inc. v. Hendry (1988), 48 D.L.R. (4th) 228 (Sask. Q.B.)); where one party will suffer permanent market loss or irrevocable damage to its business reputation (American Cyanamid, supra); or where a permanent loss of natural resources will be the result when a challenged activity is not enjoined (MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Mullin, [1985] 3 W.W.R. 577 (B.C.C.A.)). The fact that one party may be impecunious does not automatically determine the application in favour of the other party who will not ultimately be able to collect damages, although it may be a relevant consideration (Hubbard v. Pitt, [1976] Q.B. 142 (C.A.)).

65 The assessment of irreparable harm in interlocutory applications involving Charter rights is a task which will often be more difficult than a comparable assessment in a private law application. One reason for this is that the notion of irreparable harm is closely tied to the remedy of damages, but damages are not the primary remedy in Charter cases.

66 This Court has on several occasions accepted the principle that damages may be awarded for a breach of Charter rights: (see, for example, Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863 , at pp. 883, 886, 943 and 971; Nelles v. Ontario, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170 , at p. 196). However, no body of jurisprudence has yet developed in respect of the principles which might govern the award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter . In light of the uncertain state of the law regarding the award of damages for a Charter breach, it will in most cases be impossible for a judge on an interlocutory application to determine whether adequate compensation could ever be obtained at trial. Therefore, until the law in this area has developed further, it is appropriate to assume that the financial damage which will be suffered by an applicant following a refusal of relief, even though capable of quantification, constitutes irreparable harm.

D. The Balance of Inconvenience and Public Interest Considerations

67 The third test to be applied in an application for interlocutory relief was described by Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores at p. 129 as: "a determination of which of the two parties will suffer the greater harm from the granting or refusal of an interlocutory injunction, pending a decision on the merits". In light of the relatively low threshold of the first test and the difficulties in applying the test of irreparable harm in Charter cases, many interlocutory proceedings will be determined at this stage.

68 The factors which must be considered in assessing the "balance of inconvenience" are numerous and will vary in each individual case. In American Cyanamid , Lord Diplock cautioned, at p. 408, that:

> [i]t would be unwise to attempt even to list all the various matters which may need to be taken into consideration in deciding where the balance lies, let alone to suggest the relative weight to be attached to them. These will vary from case to case.

He added, at p. 409, that "there may be many other special factors to be taken into consideration in the particular circumstances of individual cases."

69 The decision in Metropolitan Stores , at p. 149, made clear that in all constitutional cases the public interest is a 'special factor' which must be considered in assessing where the balance of convenience lies and which must be "given the weight it should carry." This was the approach properly followed by Blair J. of the General Division of the Ontario Court in Ainsley Financial Corp. v. Ontario Securities Commission (1993), 14 O.R. (3d) 280 , at pp. 303-4:

> Interlocutory injunctions involving a challenge to the constitutional validity of legislation or to the authority of a law enforcement agency stand on a different footing than ordinary cases involving claims for such relief as between private litigants. The interests of the public, which the agency is created to protect, must be taken into account and weighed in the balance, along with the interests of the private litigants.

1. The Public Interest

70 Some general guidelines as to the methods to be used in assessing the balance of inconvenience were elaborated by Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores . A few additional points may be made. It is the "polycentric" nature of the Charter which requires a consideration of the public interest in determining the balance of convenience: see Jamie Cassels, "An Inconvenient Balance: The Injunction as a Charter Remedy", in J. Berryman, ed., Remedies: Issues and Perspectives , 1991, 271, at pp. 301-5. However, the government does not have a monopoly on the public interest. As Cassels points out at p. 303:

> While it is of utmost importance to consider the public interest in the balance of convenience, the public interest in Charter litigation is not unequivocal or asymmetrical in the way suggested in Metropolitan Stores . The Attorney General is not the exclusive representative of a monolithic "public" in Charter disputes, nor does the applicant always represent only an individualized claim. Most often, the applicant can also claim to represent one vision of the "public interest". Similarly, the public interest may not always gravitate in favour of enforcement of existing legislation.

71 It is, we think, appropriate that it be open to both parties in an interlocutory Charter proceeding to rely upon considerations of the public interest. Each party is entitled to make the court aware of the damage it might suffer prior to a decision on the merits. In addition, either the applicant or the respondent may tip the scales of convenience in its favour by demonstrating to the court a compelling public interest in the granting or refusal of the relief sought. "Public interest" includes both the concerns of society generally and the particular interests of identifiable groups.

72 We would therefore reject an approach which excludes consideration of any harm not directly suffered by a party to the application. Such was the position taken by the trial judge in Morgentaler v. Ackroyd (1983), 150 D.L.R. (3d) 59 (Ont. H.C.) , per Linden J., at p. 66.

> The applicants rested their argument mainly on the irreparable loss to their potential women patients, who would be unable to secure abortions if the clinic is not allowed to perform them. Even if it were established that these women would suffer irreparable harm, such evidence would not indicate any irreparable harm to these applicants , which would warrant this court issuing an injunction at their behest. [Emphasis in original.]

73 When a private applicant alleges that the public interest is at risk that harm must be demonstrated. This is since private applicants are normally presumed to be pursuing their own interests rather than those of the public at large. In considering the balance of convenience and the public interest, it does not assist an applicant to claim that a given government authority does not represent the public interest. Rather, the applicant must convince the court of the public interest benefits which will flow from the granting of the relief sought.

74 Courts have addressed the issue of the harm to the public interest which can be relied upon by a public authority in different ways. On the one hand is the view expressed by the Federal Court of Appeal in Attorney General of Canada v. Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of B.C., [1985] 1 F.C. 791 , which overturned the trial judge's issuance of an injunction restraining Fisheries Officers from implementing a fishing plan adopted under the Fisheries Act , R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, for several reasons, including, at p. 795:

> (b) the Judge assumed that the grant of the injunction would not cause any damage to the appellants. This was wrong. When a public authority is prevented from exercising its statutory powers, it can be said, in a case like the present one, that the public interest, of which that authority is the guardian, suffers irreparable harm.

This dictum received the guarded approval of Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores at p. 139. It was applied by the Trial Division of the Federal Court in Esquimalt Anglers' Association v. Canada (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) (1988), 21 F.T.R. 304 .

75 A contrary view was expressed by McQuaid J.A. of the P.E.I. Court of Appeal in Island Telephone Co., Re (1987), 67 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 158 , who, in granting a stay of an order of the Public Utilities Commission pending appeal, stated at p. 164:

> I can see no circumstances whatsoever under which the Commission itself could be inconvenienced by a stay pending appeal. As a regulatory body, it has no vested interest, as such, in the outcome of the appeal. In fact, it is not inconceivable that it should welcome any appeal which goes especially to its jurisdiction, for thereby it is provided with clear guidelines for the future, in situations where doubt may have therefore existed. The pub lic interest is equally well served, in the same sense, by any appeal....

76 In our view, the concept of inconvenience should be widely construed in Charter cases. In the case of a public authority, the onus of demonstrating irreparable harm to the public interest is less than that of a private applicant. This is partly a function of the nature of the public authority and partly a function of the action sought to be enjoined. The test will nearly always be satisfied simply upon proof that the authority is charged with the duty of promoting or protecting the public interest and upon some indication that the impugned legislation, regulation, or activity was undertaken pursuant to that responsibility. Once these minimal requirements have been met, the court should in most cases assume that irreparable harm to the public interest would result from the restraint of that action.

77 A court should not, as a general rule, attempt to ascertain whether actual harm would result from the restraint sought. To do so would in effect require judicial inquiry into whether the government is governing well, since it implies the possibility that the government action does not have the effect of promoting the public interest and that the restraint of the action would therefore not harm the public interest. The Charter does not give the courts a licence to evaluate the effectiveness of government action, but only to restrain it where it encroaches upon fundamental rights.

78 Consideration of the public interest may also be influenced by other factors. In Metropolitan Stores , it was observed that public interest considerations will weigh more heavily in a "suspension" case than in an "exemption" case. The reason for this is that the public interest is much less likely to be detrimentally affected when a discrete and limited number of applicants are exempted from the application of certain provisions of a law than when the application of certain provisions of a law is suspended entirely. See Black v. Law Society of Alberta (1983), 144 D.L.R. (3d) 439 ; Vancouver General Hospital v. Stoffman (1985), 23 D.L.R. (4th) 146 ; Rio Hotel Ltd. v. Commission des licences et permis d'alcool, [1986] 2 S.C.R. ix .

79 Similarly, even in suspension cases, a court may be able to provide some relief if it can sufficiently limit the scope of the applicant's request for relief so that the general public interest in the continued application of the law is not affected. Thus in Ontario Jockey Club v. Smith (1922), 22 O.W.N. 373 (H.C.) , the court restrained the enforcement of an impugned taxation statute against the applicant but ordered him to pay an amount equivalent to the tax into court pending the disposition of the main action.

2. The Status Quo

80 In the course of discussing the balance of convenience in American Cyanamid , Lord Diplock stated at p. 408 that when everything else is equal, "it is a counsel of prudence to ... preserve the status quo." This approach would seem to be of limited value in private law cases, and, although there may be exceptions, as a general rule it has no merit as such in the face of the alleged violation of fundamental rights. One of the functions of the Charter is to provide individuals with a tool to challenge the existing order of things or status quo. The issues have to be balanced in the manner described in these reasons.

E. Summary

81 It may be helpful at this stage to review the factors to be considered on an application for interlocutory relief in a Charter case.

82 As indicated in Metropolitan Stores , the three-part American Cyanamid test should be applied to applications for interlocutory injunctions and as well for stays in both private law and Charter cases.

83 At the first stage, an applicant for interlocutory relief in a Charter case must demonstrate a serious question to be tried. Whether the test has been satisfied should be determined by a motions judge on the basis of common sense and an extremely limited review of the case on the merits. The fact that an appellate court has granted leave in the main action is, of course, a relevant and weighty consideration, as is any judgment on the merits which has been rendered, although neither is necessarily conclusive of the matter. A motions court should only go beyond a preliminary investigation of the merits when the result of the interlocutory motion will in effect amount to a final determination of the action, or when the constitutionality of a challenged statute can be determined as a pure question of law. Instances of this sort will be exceedingly rare. Unless the case on the merits is frivolous or vexatious, or the constitutionality of the statute is a pure question of law, a judge on a motion for relief must, as a general rule, consider the second and third stages of the Metropolitan Stores test.

84 At the second stage the applicant must convince the court that it will suffer irreparable harm if the relief is not granted. 'Irreparable' refers to the nature of the harm rather than its magnitude. In Charter cases, even quantifiable financial loss relied upon by an applicant may be considered irreparable harm so long as it is unclear that such loss could be recovered at the time of a decision on the merits.

85 The third branch of the test, requiring an assessment of the balance of inconvenience, will often determine the result in applications involving Charter rights. In addition to the damage each party alleges it will suffer, the interest of the public must be taken into account. The effect a decision on the application will have upon the public interest may be relied upon by either party. These public interest considerations will carry less weight in exemption cases than in suspension cases. When the nature and declared purpose of legislation is to promote the public interest, a motions court should not be concerned whether the legislation actually has such an effect. It must be assumed to do so. In order to overcome the assumed benefit to the public interest arising from the continued application of the legislation, the applicant who relies on the public interest must demonstrate that the suspension of the legislation would itself provide a public benefit.

86 We would add to this brief summary that, as a general rule, the same principles would apply when a government authority is the applicant in a motion for interlocutory relief. However, the issue of public interest, as an aspect of irreparable harm to the interests of the government, will be considered in the second stage. It will again be considered in the third stage when harm to the applicant is balanced with harm to the respondent including any harm to the public interest established by the latter.

VII. Application of the Principles to these Cases

A. A Serious Question to be Tried

87 The applicants contend that these cases raise several serious issues to be tried. Among these is the question of the application of the rational connection and the minimal impairment tests in order to justify the infringement upon freedom of expression occasioned by a blanket ban on tobacco advertising. On this issue, Chabot J. of the Quebec Superior Court and Brossard J.A. in dissent in the Court of Appeal held that the government had not satisfied these tests and that the ban could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter . The majority of the Court of Appeal held that the ban was justified. The conflict in the reasons arises from different interpretations of the extent to which recent jurisprudence has relaxed the onus fixed upon the state in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 , to justify its action in public welfare initiatives. This Court has granted leave to hear the appeals on the merits. When faced with separate motions for interlocutory relief pertaining to these cases, the Quebec Court of Appeal stated that "[w]hatever the outcome of these appeals, they clearly raise serious constitutional issues." This observation of the Quebec Court of Appeal and the decision to grant leaves to appeal clearly indicate that these cases raise serious questions of law.

B. Irreparable Harm

88 The applicants allege that if they are not granted interlocutory relief they will be forced to spend very large sums of money immediately in order to comply with the regulations. In the event that their appeals are allowed by this Court, the applicants contend that they will not be able either to recover their costs from the government or to revert to their current packaging practices without again incurring the same expense.

89 Monetary loss of this nature will not usually amount to irreparable harm in private law cases. Where the government is the unsuccessful party in a constitutional claim, however, a plaintiff will face a much more difficult task in establishing constitutional liability and obtaining monetary redress. The expenditures which the new regulations require will therefore impose irreparable harm on the applicants if these motions are denied but the main actions are successful on appeal.

C. Balance of Inconvenience

90 Among the factors which must be considered in order to determine whether the granting or withholding of interlocutory relief would occasion greater inconvenience are the nature of the relief sought and of the harm which the parties contend they will suffer, the nature of the legislation which is under attack, and where the public interest lies.

91 The losses which the applicants would suffer should relief be denied are strictly financial in nature. The required expenditure is significant and would undoubtedly impose considerable economic hardship on the two companies. Nonetheless, as pointed out by the respondent, the applicants are large and very successful corporations, each with annual earnings well in excess of $50,000,000. They have a greater capacity to absorb any loss than would many smaller enterprises. Secondarily, assuming that the demand for cigarettes is not solely a function of price, the companies may also be able to pass on some of their losses to their customers in the form of price increases. Therefore, although the harm suffered may be irreparable, it will not affect the long-term viability of the applicants.

92 Second, the applicants are two companies who seek to be exempted from compliance with the latest regulations published under the Tobacco Products Control Act . On the face of the matter, this case appears to be an "exemption case" as that phrase was used by Beetz J. in Metropolitan Stores . However, since there are only three tobacco producing companies operating in Canada, the application really is in the nature of a "suspension case". The applicants admitted in argument that they were in effect seeking to suspend the application of the new regulations to all tobacco producing companies in Canada for a period of one year following the judgment of this Court on the merits. The result of these motions will therefore affect the whole of the Canadian tobacco producing industry. Further, the impugned provisions are broad in nature. Thus it is appropriate to classify these applications as suspension cases and therefore ones in which "the public interest normally carries greater weight in favour of compliance with existing legislation" (p. 147).

93 The weight accorded to public interest concerns is partly a function of the nature of legislation generally, and partly a function of the purposes of the specific piece of legislation under attack. As Beetz J. explained, at p. 135, in Metropolitan Stores :

> Whether or not they are ultimately held to be constitutional, the laws which litigants seek to suspend or from which they seek to be exempted by way of interlocutory injunctive relief have been enacted by demo cratically-elected legislatures and are generally passed for the common good, for instance: ... the protection of public health .... It seems axiomatic that the granting of interlocutory injunctive relief in most suspension cases and, up to a point, as will be seen later, in quite a few exemption cases, is susceptible temporarily to frustrate the pursuit of the common good. [Emphasis added.]

94 The regulations under attack were adopted pursuant to s. 3 of the Tobacco Products Control Act which states:

> 3. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
>
> (a) to protect the health of Canadians in the light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
>
> (b) to protect young persons and others, to the extent that is reasonable in a free and democratic society, from inducements to use tobacco products and consequent dependence on them; and
> (c) to enhance public awareness of the hazards of tobacco use by ensuring the effective communication of pertinent information to consumers of tobacco products.

95 The Regulatory Impact Analysis Statement, in the Canada Gazette , Part II, Vol. 127, No. 16, p. 3284, at p. 3285, which accompanied the regulations stated:

> The increased number and revised format of the health messages reflect the strong consensus of the public health community that the serious health hazards of using these products be more fully and effectively communicated to consumers. Support for these changes has been manifested by hundreds of letters and a number of submissions by public health groups highly critical of the initial regulatory requirements under this legislation as well as a number of Departmental studies indicating their need.

96 These are clear indications that the government passed the regulations with the intention of protecting public health and thereby furthering the public good. Further, both parties agree that past studies have shown that health warnings on tobacco product packages do have some effects in terms of increasing public awareness of the dangers of smoking and in reducing the overall incidence of smoking in our society. The applicants, however, argued strenuously that the government has not shown and cannot show that the specific requirements imposed by the impugned regulations have any positive public benefits. We do not think that such an argument assists the applicants at this interlocutory stage.

97 When the government declares that it is passing legislation in order to protect and promote public health and it is shown that the restraints which it seeks to place upon an industry are of the same nature as those which in the past have had positive public benefits, it is not for a court on an interlocutory motion to assess the actual benefits which will result from the specific terms of the legislation. That is particularly so in this case, where this very matter is one of the main issues to be resolved in the appeal. Rather, it is for the applicants to offset these public interest considerations by demonstrating a more compelling public interest in suspending the application of the legislation.

98 The applicants in these cases made no attempt to argue any public interest in the continued application of current packaging requirements rather than the new requirements. The only possible public interest is that of smokers' not having the price of a package of cigarettes increase. Such an increase is not likely to be excessive and is purely economic in nature. Therefore, any public interest in maintaining the current price of tobacco products cannot carry much weight. This is particularly so when it is balanced against the undeniable importance of the public interest in health and in the pre vention of the widespread and serious medical problems directly attributable to smoking.

99 The balance of inconvenience weighs strongly in favour of the respondent and is not offset by the irreparable harm that the applicants may suffer if relief is denied. The public interest in health is of such compelling importance that the applications for a stay must be dismissed with costs to the successful party on the appeal.

Applications dismissed.

McLachlin C.J.C, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour, LeBel JJ.*:

1 On May 31, 2000, Parliament passed the Canada Elections Act, S.C. 2000, c. 9 ("the Act"), imposing limits on third-party spending on advertising in the course of a federal election campaign. The law came into force on September 1, 2000. Our reasons in this application relate solely to the issue of whether an injunction which suspended the enforcement of certain provisions pertaining to third-party spending limits should be stayed. They do not deal with the granting of leave to appeal the injunction order nor any ensuing appeal. They also do not deal with the question of whether the Act is unconstitutional.

2 The respondent Stephen Joseph Harper commenced an action on June 7, 2000 before the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, seeking a declaration that the spending limits are unconstitutional because they unjustifiably limit the right of free expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The trial commenced on October 2 and adjourned on October 13, after nine days of evidence.

3 On October 22, an election writ was issued, with a polling date of November 27, 2000. Mr. Harper applied to the same trial judge (Cairns J.), who heard the action seeking a declaration that the spending limits are unconstitutional, for an interlocutory injunction restraining the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and the Commissioner of Canada Elections from enforcing the third-party spending limits, pending the decision in the action. The trial judge granted the injunction ((October 23, 2000), Doc. 0001-09477 (Alta. Q.B.)), and the Alberta Court of Appeal upheld it (2000 ABCA 288 (Alta. C.A.)). The Attorney General of Canada now applies to this Court, seeking leave to appeal from the interlocutory injunction and, in the interim, a stay of the injunction. The application for leave to appeal is granted, by separate order, released concurrently. This leaves the question of whether the injunction restraining the enforcement of the law imposing spending limits should be stayed.

4 In considering whether an injunction should be granted, and by extension whether an injunction should be stayed pending appeal, the Court considers: (i) whether there is a serious issue to be tried; (ii) whether absent an injunction there will be irreparable harm to the individual seeking the injunction; and (iii) the balance of (in)convenience. Without prejudging the appeal, we are satisfied there is a serious issue to be tried. The issue is no less than the constitutionality of provisions of the electoral law passed by the Parliament of Canada which no court has held to be invalid. This is a serious issue not only because the constitutionality of the provisions is challenged, but because it is common ground that the determination of the constitutionality will turn on the application of s. 1 of the Charter, which is always a complex factual and legal analysis. We also assume that the provisions in issue may occasion "irreparable harm" to the capacity of third parties to participate as they wish in the election campaign to the extent of the spending limits on advertising imposed on them. This leaves the third ground, the balance of convenience.

5 Applications for interlocutory injunctions against enforcement of still-valid legislation under constitutional attack raise special considerations when it comes to determining the balance of convenience. On the one hand stands the benefit flowing from the law. On the other stand the rights that the law is alleged to infringe. An interlocutory injunction may have the effect of depriving the public of the benefit of a statute which has been duly enacted and which may in the end be held valid, and of granting effective victory to the applicant before the case has been judicially decided. Conversely, denying or staying the injunction may deprive plaintiffs of constitutional rights simply because the courts cannot move quickly enough: R. J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (loose leaf ed.), at para. 3.1220.

6 The trial judge found that the freedom of speech interest raised by the applicant Harper to be of great importance. On the other side of the balance, he found that the Attorney General of Canada had called no evidence on the harm that would result from suspending the operation of the law. In the absence of evidence, he characterized this harm as "notional and unproven unfairness" (para. 35). Accordingly, he found that the balance of convenience favoured the grant of an injunction.

7 We cannot, with respect, agree. This application is governed by the principles set forth in previous cases. On appeal the applicant Harper may seek alteration of these principles, but for the moment they govern. Applying these principles, the balance of convenience in this case favours granting the stay of the injunction. One of these principles is the rule against granting the equivalent of final relief in interlocutory challenges to electoral statutes, even in the course of elections governed by those statutes: Gould v. Canada (Attorney General), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 124 (S.C.C.); see also Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd. v. Manitoba Food & Commercial Workers, Local 832, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 (S.C.C.), per Beetz J. at p. 144; Haig v. R., [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995 (S.C.C.). In this case, allowing the injunction to stay in place will in effect give Mr. Harper the ultimate relief he seeks in his action, at least with respect to the current election. The trial judge, however, did not address this factor, nor the case law which addresses it.

8 It may also be noted that, in Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), S.C.C., No. 25593, May 7, 1997 (published in the Bulletin of Proceedings of the Supreme Court of Canada, 1997, at p. 882), this Court refused to grant a stay suspending the enforcement of the provisions mandating publication bans on opinion polls set forth in the Canada Elections Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-2, s. 322.1. In so doing, the Court relied on its previous decision in Gould, supra. The Court refused the stay even though the ultimate decision found the poll prohibition to be unconstitutional.

9 Another principle set out in the cases is that in considering the grant of an interlocutory injunction suspending the operation of a validly enacted but challenged law, it is wrong to insist on proof that the law will produce a public good. Rather, at this stage of the proceeding, this is presumed. As Sopinka and Cory JJ. stated in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311 (S.C.C.), at pp. 348-49:

> When the nature and declared purpose of legislation is to promote the public interest, a motions court should not be concerned whether the legislation actually has such an effect. It must be assumed to do so. In order to overcome the assumed benefit to the public interest arising from the continued application of the legislation, the applicant who relies on the public interest must demonstrate that the suspension of the legislation would itself provide a public benefit.

It follows that in assessing the balance of convenience, the motions judge must proceed on the assumption that the law — in this case the spending limits imposed by s. 350 of the Act — is directed to the public good and serves a valid public purpose. This applies to violations of the s. 2(b) right of freedom of expression; indeed, the violation at issue in RJR-MacDonald Inc. was of s. 2(b). The assumption of the public interest in enforcing the law weighs heavily in the balance. Courts will not lightly order that laws that Parliament or a legislature has duly enacted for the public good are inoperable in advance of complete constitutional review, which is always a complex and difficult matter. It follows that only in clear cases will interlocutory injunctions against the enforcement of a law on grounds of alleged unconstitutionality succeed.

10 Again, the trial judge appears not to have applied this principle in weighing the benefits of the law against its impact on free expression. Instead of assuming that the legislation has the effect of promoting the public interest as RJR-MacDonald Inc. directs, the trial judge based his conclusion on the fact that the Government " has not adduced any evidence to illustrate unfairness in any of these elections in Canada caused by third-party spending limits" (para. 33). He went on to repeat that the "Government simply asserts that third-party spending limits, if not controlled, may (and that is notional only) impact adversely on the fairness of elections" (para. 34), and moved directly from this to the conclusion that leaving the spending limits in place " would clearly cause more harm in the public interest than the notional unproven unfairness suggested by the Government" (para. 35). Moreover, the trial judge made no mention of the fact that the law may be seen not only as limiting free expression but as regulating it in order to permit all voices during an election to be heard fairly.

11 Applying the principles enunciated in previous decisions of this Court, and without prejudging the outcome of any appeal from the injunction, we are satisfied that the public interest in maintaining in place the duly enacted legislation on spending limits pending complete constitutional review outweighs the detriment to freedom of expression caused by those limits. To leave the injunction in place is to grant substantial success to the applicant Harper even though the trial has not been completed. Moreover, applying RJR-MacDonald Inc., we must take as given at this stage that the legislation imposing spending limits on third parties will serve a valid public purpose. Weighing these factors against the partial limitation on freedom of expression imposed by the restrictions, we conclude that the balance of convenience favours staying the injunction granted by the trial judge.

Conclusion

12 We therefore conclude that a stay of the order enjoining the enforcement of s. 350(1), (2), (3) and (4) of the Canada Elections Act should be granted.

Major J.* (dissenting):

13 The facts that accompany this application by the Attorney General of Canada for a stay of the injunction obtained in Alberta are not in dispute. The chambers judge, relying on the pleadings and the evidence at the trial, faced the concession that the plaintiff Mr. Harper's freedom of expression was restricted by the legislation. Weighed against this was the inability of the Attorney General to demonstrate that the injunction would cause any inconvenience (see (October 23, 2000), Doc. 0001-09477 (Alta. Q.B.), at paras. 34-35 per Cairns J.):

> The Government simply asserts that third-party spending limits, if not controlled, may (and this is notional only) impact adversely on the fairness of elections. Yet, it can point to no evidence to illustrate unfairness in the Canadian elections caused by third-party spending.
> In my judgment, the spending limits having the deleterious effect of fettering the core freedom of expression and speech as enshrined in the Charter, as they do and as admitted by the Attorney General of Canada, would clearly cause more harm in the public interest than the notional unproven unfairness suggested by the Government.

14 As described in the reasons of the majority, an injunction should be granted where: (1) there is a serious question to be tried, (2) there is irreparable harm to the person seeking the injunction if no injunction is issued, and (3) the balance of convenience favours an injunction.

15 It is on the determination of the balance of convenience that I disagree with the majority. The chambers judge, who was also the trial judge in the recently concluded trial, was in a unique position to weigh the balance of convenience.

16 The trial judge did not, nor do I, intend the interim injunction to reflect on the validity of the new elections legislation. The question of whether the limits on election spending are constitutional will only be decided once there is a determination on the merits.

17 It is inescapable to me that the balance of convenience tips sharply in favour of the plaintiff. The proposition advanced to counter the obvious inconvenience to Mr. Harper is that legislation generally identified as serving a public interest carries a prima facie assumption of validity. But that presumption should not be conclusive where, as here, it competes against the acknowledged impediment to the plaintiff's free speech unless there is some evidence demonstrating an impediment of a public interest. Here there is none.

18 The chambers judge was careful to note that the interim injunction was just that. He stated that his ultimate disposition may be that the legislation is constitutional. But he could not ignore the evidence produced during the two-week trial to the extent it bore on granting an interim injunction.

19 The interim injunction would safeguard important constitutional rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and protect the freedom of political speech during a federal election. The law is clear that — in the absence of an error in principle — the trial judge has the discretion, and is entitled to appellate deference.

20 In this application, we are dealing with one of the most valuable forms of speech: political speech. Canadians cherish the unimpeded diffusion of political ideas and opinions, and this Court has long recognized that freedom of expression is "essential to the working of a parliamentary democracy such as ours" (Switzman v. Elbling, [1957] S.C.R. 285 (S.C.C.), per Abbott J., at p. 326). Hence we must tread carefully in limiting political speech. It is speech that we recognize as invaluable, given its significance in our democratic process. We should be loathe to interfere with it, especially in the midst of a federal election.

21 I am of the view that the trial judge did not err in applying the three-part test for an injunction in a constitutional context, as set out in Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd. v. Manitoba Food & Commercial Workers, Local 832, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 (S.C.C.), and RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311 (S.C.C.), both cases that the trial judge referred to and relied upon. As stated, I agree with the majority that the first two requirements are met.

22 The third requirement is that the balance of convenience favours granting the injunction. This requirement subsumes the question of what irreparable harm the defendant faces. After nine days of trial, there was no evidence before the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench that the injunction would cause any " inconvenience" or "irreparable harm". Nor has the Attorney General in this application referred this Court to any evidence showing what harm would result from the injunction. Instead, the Attorney General states as a conclusion that suspending the spending limits would result in unfairness, and so the legislation must be applied "in the interests of fairness for all".

23 The Attorney General admitted that there was a violation of s. 2(b), and offered not a scintilla of evidence showing that the injunction would cause some harm. In this light, the trial judge concluded that the balance of convenience favoured injunctive relief. Given the restriction upon a cherished constitutional freedom and the absence of anything tilting the other way, Cairns J. was entitled to reach this conclusion.

24 I acknowledge that in the majority of cases, it may be acceptable to assume that there is irreparable harm to the public interest when an injunction stops an authority from protecting the public good: RJR-MacDonald Inc., supra, at p. 346. But that is an assumption only (as Sopinka and Cory JJ. suggest at p. 349), and it can be overcome when an applicant demonstrates that the injunction itself serves the public interest. In this case, the injunction furthers the Charter's guarantee of freedom of expression, and Mr. Harper has displaced the assumption that the government suffers a greater harm than he does.

25 I find that the suggestion of "irreparable harm" to the government or the public interest is strained and unpersuasive. To date, Canadian federal elections have not been governed by limits on third-party spending. It is difficult to see how the consequences of undergoing one more election without these limits would somehow cause "irreparable harm" to our democratic institutions, particularly since no such harm occurred in past elections. In my view, the public interest favours granting, rather than refusing, the injunction. Dean Cassels is right to suggest that the "public interest" does not belong exclusively to the Attorney General, and I agree with his rejection of the "assumption that only one party speaks for the public interest" (J. Cassels, "An Inconvenient Balance: The Injunction as Charter Remedy", in J. Berryman, ed., Remedies: Issues and Perspectives (1991), at pp. 303-5). The question is: will the injunction serve the public good by protecting constitutional rights? Given the need to protect free speech, particularly during an election, it seems reasonable to require the Attorney General to provide something more than a pro forma statement about unfairness. In the absence of anything beyond speculation, and in the face of a serious denial of Charter-protected freedoms, the balance of convenience clearly favours the injunction. I would add that while the Attorney General argues that the public interest is served by seeing the legislation enforced, that argument is countered by the compelling public interest in seeing fundamental Charter-protected freedoms upheld: J. Berryman, The Law of Equitable Remedies (2000), at p. 51.

26 "Because the granting of an interlocutory injunction is a discretionary matter appellate courts have limited the role of review": Berryman, The Law of Equitable Remedies, supra, at p. 37. This Court endorsed the deferential approach in Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd., supra, at pp. 154-56. The standard is high; the reviewing court "must not interfere with [the trial judge's exercise of discretion] merely on the ground that the members of the appellate court would have exercised the discretion differently": Hadmor Productions Ltd. v. Hamilton, [1982] 1 All E.R. 1042 (U.K. H.L.), per Lord Diplock, at p. 1046. To interfere, there must be a clear mistake on the law or the evidence, or some other glaring error. There is no such mistake here.

27 Cairns J. is entitled to appellate deference. He was, in fact, unusually well-placed to grant the injunction. The typical judge faced with this sort of injunction would not have the benefit of having presided over the trial on the merits of the constitutional challenge.

28 It is true, as the majority suggests, that in all but exceptional cases, the effect of democratically enacted legislation should not be suspended before a finding of unconstitutionality or invalidity. Gould v. Canada (Attorney General), [1984] 1 F.C. 1133 (Fed. C.A.), aff'd [1984] 2 S.C.R. 124 (S.C.C.). But this case falls in the narrow category of exceptions. I reach that conclusion for three reasons.

29 First, there is the timing of the challenge. The new Canada Elections Act, S.C. 2000, c. 9, was given royal assent on May 31, 2000. The plaintiff's statement of claim was issued within seven days. The legislation would ordinarily have come into force after the November 27 general election, but it was activated, so to speak, by publication of notice in the Canada Gazette on September 1, 2000. The Attorney General of Canada introduced this legislation in a manner that virtually sealed it from meaningful constitutional scrutiny before the election. These circumstances demand scrutiny. The prospect arises that governments could pass unconstitutional laws immediately prior to an election and leave affected citizens with no remedy. The state could effectively place its election legislation beyond constitutional scrutiny by virtue of when that legislation is enacted. I note that the situation here is unlike that in Gould, supra, where the impugned provision had been in force for years but was challenged only on the eve of an election.

30 Another compelling factor is that the judge who handled the application for an interlocutory injunction knew the case; he had recently presided over a two-week trial in which the constitutionality of the legislation was debated in great detail. That fact distinguishes this case from Gould, supra, where the judge who granted the injunction had not heard arguments on the constitutionality of the provisions governing prisoners' voting rights. The fact that the same judge heard both the trial and the application for an injunction here argues in favour of considerable deference to his decision.

31 Finally, there is the nature of the constitutional challenge at issue. The speech that is limited here is political expression. It is the epitome of speech that furthers the aspirations of a democratic society. That expression would be limited at its most important moment, during an election, while the Attorney General offers no evidence that the injunction would cause harm.

32 The majority, at para. 7, accepts the Attorney General's submission that an injunction "effectively grants [Mr. Harper] the final relief that he seeks in the trial still under way." I do not, because the "final" question is the constitutionality of the legislation, and that question cannot be answered in these interlocutory proceedings. In any event, it could equally be said that staying the injunction gives the government the final relief it is most concerned about. That argument cuts both ways and does not get us far.

33 This Court, as Professor Roach points out in Constitutional Remedies in Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 7 7, has "clearly rejected reliance on a presumption that legislation is constitutional in deciding interlocutory applications". In Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd., supra, at p. 124, Beetz J. held that "the presumption of constitutional validity ... is not compatible with the innovative and evolutive character of [the Charter]". It could be said that the majority improperly veers toward an automatic presumption of constitutionality.

34 In RJR-MacDonald Inc., at pp. 333-34, Sopinka and Cory JJ. considered the factors that must govern the balancing process:

> On one hand, courts must be sensitive to and cautious of making rulings which deprive legislation enacted by elected officials of its effect.
> On the other hand, the Charter charges the courts with the responsibility of safeguarding fundamental rights. For the courts to insist rigidly that all legislation be enforced to the letter until the moment that it is struck down as unconstitutional might in some instances be to condone the most blatant violation of Charter rights. Such a practice would undermine the spirit and purpose of the Charter and might encourage a government to prolong unduly final resolution of the dispute.

I find those words apt. I would deny the application for a stay.

Application granted.

Gateway City Church, Applicant and The Minister of National Revenue, Respondent

Heard: May 07, 2013
Judgment: May 7, 2013
Docket: A-151-13

Counsel: Osborne G. Barnwell, for Applicant
Joanna Hill, for Respondent

David Stratas J.A.*:

1 The Gateway City Church applies for an order that, if granted, will prevent the Minister from revoking its charitable status under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.). For the reasons set out below, I dismiss the application, with costs.

A. Background

2 The Gateway City Church is registered as a charity under the Act.

3 Recently, the Minister has given notice of her intention to revoke the Church's registration as a charity: Act, subsection 168(1). The Church loses its registration as a charity when the Minister's notice is published in the Canada Gazette.

4 In her notice, the Minister alleges that the Church has failed to comply with the Act in several respects:

- Failure to maintain adequate books and records: Act, subsection 149.1(2), paragraph 168(1)(e) and section 230;

- Failure to devote all of its resources to its own charitable activities: Act, subsections 149.1(1) and 149.1(2) and paragraph 168(1)(b);

- Provision of personal benefits to a proprietor, member, shareholder, trustee or settlor: Act, subsections 149.1(1) and 149.1(2) and paragraph 168(1)(b).

5 Where, as here, the charity has not requested the revocation, the publication of the Minister's notice is deferred for 30 days in order to allow the charity to challenge it: Act, paragraph 168(2)(b). The challenge consists of the making of an objection and, if necessary, an appeal to this Court: Act, section 172. The Church has filed an objection.

6 The 30 day period can be extended: Act, paragraph 168(2)(b).

7 By application brought under Rule 300(b) of the Federal Courts Rules, the Church seeks an extension until the Minister decides upon the Church's objection, or until this Court determines the appeal from the Minister's decision, whichever is later. In effect, the Church wishes to maintain its charitable status under the Act until the merits of its objection have been determined.

B. A preliminary issue

8 The parties agree that the proper respondent is the Minister of National Revenue, not Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada. Therefore, to reflect this, the style of cause shall be amended.

C. The legal test to be applied in this application

9 The parties agree that the Church's application can be granted only if the Church meets the test for the granting of stays and injunctions: International Charity Assn. Network v. Minister of National Revenue, 2008 FCA 114 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 5. The Church must show:

- it has an arguable case against the revocation;
- it will suffer irreparable harm if the revocation is allowed to happen; and
- the balance of convenience lies in its favour.

(RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311 (S.C.C.).)

D. Applying the legal test

(1) Arguable case

10 On the first branch of the threefold test, the Church must establish that its objection raises a serious question to be tried.

11 The threshold for seriousness is "a low one" and "liberal": RJR-Macdonald, supra at page 337; 143471 Canada Inc. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 339 (S.C.C.) at page 358, per La Forest J. (dissenting, with apparent concurrence on this point from the majority). The Church need only show that the matter is not destined to fail or that it is "neither vexatious nor frivolous": RJR Macdonald, supra at page 337.

12 Given the lowness of this threshold, the Minister does not contest that the Church has met this branch of the threefold test.

(2) Irreparable harm

13 If the Church's registration as a charity is revoked, it will not be able to issue receipts for donations. Future donors will not be able to claim deductions for their donations. The Church says donations will fall off, preventing it from doing essential work for its congregation and the wider community.

14 Such a general assertion is insufficient to establish irreparable harm: Holy Alpha & Omega Church of Toronto v. Canada (Attorney General), 2009 FCA 265 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 22. That sort of general assertion can be made in every case. Accepting it as sufficient evidence of irreparable harm would unduly undercut the power Parliament has given to the Minister to protect the public interest in appropriate circumstances by publishing her notice and revoking a registration even before the determination of the objection and later appeal.

15 General assertions cannot establish irreparable harm. They essentially prove nothing:

> It is all too easy for those seeking a stay in a case like this to enumerate problems, call them serious, and then, when describing the harm that might result, to use broad, expressive terms that essentially just assert — not demonstrate to the Court's satisfaction — that the harm is irreparable.

(Stoney First Nation v. Shotclose, 2011 FCA 232 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 48.) Accordingly, "[a]ssumptions, speculations, hypotheticals and arguable assertions, unsupported by evidence, carry no weight": Glooscap Heritage Society v. Minister of National Revenue, 2012 FCA 255 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 31.

16 Instead, "there must be evidence at a convincing level of particularity that demonstrates a real probability that unavoidable irreparable harm will result unless a stay is granted": Glooscap, supra at paragraph 31. See also Dywidag Systems International Canada Ltd. v. Garford Pty Ltd., 2010 FCA 232 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 14; Canada (Attorney General) v. Canada (Information Commissioner), 2001 FCA 25, 268 N.R. 328 (Fed. C.A.) at paragraph 12; Canada (Superintendent of Bankruptcy) v. MacLeod, 2010 FCA 84 (F.C.A.) at paragraph 17.

17 In this case, the evidence tendered by the Church falls short in a number of respects:

- The evidence shows that the Church's members seem loyal and have donated much in past years. Much is said about the Church's importance and value to its congregation and the community. Will donors suddenly reduce their donations to zero because they cannot obtain a charitable receipt?

- There is no evidence from donors in the record. It is speculative to conclude that donations will fall off to such an extent that the Church's existence is imperilled.

- Even if donations fall off to some extent, there is no evidence showing how this will affect the Church's overall budgetary position. What is the Church's budgetary position? What assets does it have? What liabilities does it have? Between now and the ultimate determination of the Church's objection or later appeal, what financial events will take place? The record is silent.

- The Church asserts that it will no longer be able to rent facilities for its services and Bible classes. It adds that benevolence assistance to local food banks and singleparent households in need will stop. It says that other beneficial payments it makes will stop. But without information about the financial circumstances of the Church and the size of these expenditures, these assertions cannot qualify as irreparable harm.

18 Irreparable harm must be demonstrated, not just asserted. Demonstration is achieved by supplying particular information that empowers the Court to find the existence of harm that cannot be repaired later. In the record before this Court, there is only assertion, not demonstration.

19 Counsel for the Church fairly conceded that particularity was missing from the evidence the Church tendered. However, he urged the Court to view this in the context of this application — a proceeding brought urgently, with little time to prepare.

20 I accept there was urgency in bringing this application. However, to some extent, the urgency was created by the Church's delay in retaining and instructing counsel.

21 In her notice of intention, the Minister told the Church it had thirty days to apply to this Court for relief. Thirty days was more than enough time for the Church to retain counsel and file evidence disclosing the particular information known to it and readily at hand.

(3) The balance of convenience

22 It is not necessary to consider this branch of the threefold test.

E. Disposition

23 The Church has failed to demonstrate irreparable harm. For this reason, its application must be dismissed, with costs.

Application dismissed.

The Minister of Health and Community services was granted custody of the mother's three children for six months and brought an application to extend the custody order for a further six months. The mother was indigent and receiving social assistance. The mother's application for legal aid was denied. The legal aid programs in place in New Brunswick at the time provided funding for permanent guardianship application but not for temporary custody applications or extensions of existing orders. The mother brought a motion for an order directing provision of sufficient funds to cover reasonable fees and disbursements for counsel or for the provision of counsel. She was also seeking a declaration that the rules and policies governing the distribution of domestic legal aid were contrary to s. 15(1) and violated s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms . The custody application was heard prior to the determination of the right to paid counsel. The mother was represented in the custody hearing by duty counsel on a pro bono basis. At the custody hearing, the Minister called testimony and presented affidavit evidence from 15 witnesses, including expert psychological reports. The Minister was granted the extension.

The mother's motion was dismissed almost a year later. The motions judge concluded that the failure to provide the mother with legal aid did not violate s. 7 or s. 15(1). The provision of counsel to represent the mother was not found to be essential to a fair trial and the mother's liberty interest would not be violated by the lack of state-funded legal representation. The mother's appeal was dismissed. The majority of the Court of Appeal found that there could be no s. 7 violation if the mother was unrepresented as parental liberty did not fall within the ambit of s. 7 of the Charter . The provisions of the Family Services Act were found to ensure reasonable compliance with constitutional standards if complied with. The majority found that the court would be exercising a legislative function if it allowed the appeal as it would be involving the courts in the task of both defining the scope of legal aid and the administering of legal aid. The mother appealed.

Held: The appeal was allowed.

Per Lamer C.J.C. (Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Major and Binnie JJ. concurring): The mother was represented by counsel at the custody hearing and the custody order has expired. The mother regained custody. The issue has become academic. However, the discretion of the court should be exercised to decide the case and the legal issues which arose in this case should be addressed notwithstanding their mootness. There was an appropriate adversarial context and the appeal was vigorously and fully argued on both sides. The question of whether a parent has a right to state-funded legal representation at a custody hearing is undoubtedly of national importance and one which is evasive of review. The Court is not overstepping its institutional role in deciding this appeal. The analysis of the appeal must proceed on the assumption that the custody hearing had not yet taken place and that the mother would not have been represented by counsel at the hearing. The approach must be prospective, not retrospective.

The Minister's extension application threatened to restrict the mother's right to security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms . The right to security of the person protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual. For a restriction of security of the person to be made out, the impugned action must have a serious and profound effect on a person's psychological integrity. The effects of the state interference must be assessed objectively, with a view to their impact on the psychological integrity of a person of reasonable sensitivity. This does not need to rise to the level of nervous shock or psychiatric illness but must be greater than ordinary stress or anxiety. The state removal of a child from parental custody constitutes a serious interference with the psychological integrity of the parent. Profound effects would be felt by both parent and child if separated. Direct state interference into the parent-child relationship through a procedure in which the relationship is subject to state inspection and review is a gross intrusion into a private and intimate sphere. The stigma and distress resulting from a loss of parental status is a particularly serious consequence.

The potential restriction to the mother's right to security of the person would not have been in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice had the custody hearing proceeded with the mother unrepresented by counsel. Section 7 guarantees every parent the right to a fair hearing when the state seeks to obtain custody of their children. The parent must have an opportunity to present his or her case effectively for a hearing to be fair. Effective parental participation at the hearing is essential in circumstances where the parent seeks to maintain custody of the child as the judge may be unable to make an accurate determination of the child's best interest if the parent is denied the opportunity to participate effectively. In the circumstances of this case, the mother's right to a fair hearing required that she be represented by counsel. Whether it is necessary for the parent to be represented by counsel is directly proportional to the seriousness and complexity of the proceedings, and inversely proportional to the capacities of the parent. Child custody proceedings are adversarial and the parties are responsible for planning and presenting their cases. Difficult evidentiary issues are frequently raised. The parent must adduce evidence, cross-examine witnesses, make objections and present legal defences in a foreign environment while under significant emotional strain. In proceedings as serious and complex as these, the unrepresented parent would need to possess superior intelligence or education, communication skills and a familiarity with the legal system in order to effectively present his or her case. No evidence suggested that the mother possessed such capacities. The potential s. 7 violation would have been the result of the failure of the government to provide the mother with state-funded counsel under its domestic legal aid program after initiating proceedings.

The Charter infringement was not caused by the legislation itself. The legislation clearly indicates that state-funded legal counsel may be provided. The infringement was caused by a decision by the delegated decision-maker not to cover these types of hearings. The additional cost of providing state-funded counsel is insufficient to constitute justification for the restriction and infringement within the meaning of s. 1 of the Charter . A parent's right to a fair hearing when the state seeks to suspend such parent's custody of his or her child outweighs the relatively modest sums saved by the state. Leaving the policy intact subject to a discretion vested in the trial judge to order state-funded counsel on a case-by-case basis when necessary to ensure the fairness of the custody hearing would be the least intrusive remedy. The procedure for coming to the determination of necessity would give consideration to the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings and the capacities of the parent.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J. (Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. concurring): Issues of gender equality are necessarily raised in this matter as women and especially single mothers are disproportionately and particularly affected by child protection proceedings. The patterns of relationships within marriage disproportionately lead to women taking responsibility for child care, foregoing economic opportunities in the workforce and suffering economic deprivation as a result. Issues involving poor parents necessarily disproportionately affect women. Principles of equality, guaranteed by both ss. 15 and 28 of the Charter , are a significant influence on interpreting the scope of protection offered by s. 7. In considering the s. 7 rights at issue and the principles of fundamental justice that apply to the situation, it is important to ensure that the analysis takes into account the principles and purposes of the equality guarantee in promoting the equal benefit of the law and ensuring that the law responds to the needs of those disadvantaged individuals and groups whose protection is at the heart of s. 15.

Parental decision-making and other attributes of custody are protected under the liberty interest in s. 7 of the Charter . A parent's security of the person will be violated, due to the importance of one's identity as a parent and the serious stigma and psychological stress caused by the removal of a child from the home, if a child is removed from the home because the parent's power to care for him or her is removed. The trial judge did not adequately consider the values of meaningful participation in the hearing affecting the rights of the child or the complexity of this case and the difficulty the mother would face in presenting her case. A trial judge must consider the seriousness of the interests, the complexity of the proceedings and the characteristics of the parent affected in determining whether a parent will be able to participate effectively in the hearing. Trial judges should be attentive to the fact that temporary applications are often part of a process that leads to permanent ones, and it is necessary to consider the seriousness of the proceeding in relation to both the short-term and long-term interests of the parents affected. The length of proceedings, the type of evidence presented, the number of witnesses and complexity and technicality of the proceedings must be important considerations in evaluating the overall complexity of the proceedings. The courts must be particularly careful to avoid including factors in the test relating to the capacity of the parents which may make it more difficult for the parent when presenting her case on the merits. The focus should be on the parent's education level, linguistic abilities, facility in communicating, age and similar indicators.

Le ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires a obtenu la garde des trois enfants de la mère pour une période de six mois et a demandé une prorogation de l'ordonnance de garde pour une autre période de six mois. La mère était pauvre et recevait de l'aide sociale. Sa demande d'aide juridique a été refusée. Les programmes d'aide juridique qui étaient en vigueur au Nouveau-Brunswick au moment de la demande ne permettaient l'octroi d'une aide financière qu'à l'égard des demandes de garde permanente, et non pour les demandes de garde temporaire ou les demandes de prorogation d'ordonnances de garde déjà rendues. La mère a déposé une requête pour obtenir un jugement ordonnant au ministre de lui accorder les fonds nécessaires pour couvrir les honoraires et débours raisonnables d'un avocat. Elle a en outre sollicité un jugement déclarant que la réglementation et les politiques régissant l'octroi d'une assistance juridique en matière de droit de la famille contrevenaient à l'art. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et enfreignait l'art. 7 de la Charte. L'audience de la requête relative à la garde a eu lieu avant celle concernant la détermination du droit aux services d'un avocat rémunéré par l'État. Lors de l'audition de la requête concernant la garde, la mère était représentée par un avocat de service qui agissait bénévolement. Lors de l'audition de la requête concernant la garde, le ministère a présenté, sous forme de dépositions orales ou de déclarations assermentées, 15 témoignages, comprenant des rapports psychologiques. La demande de prorogation du ministre a été accordée.

La requête de la mère a été rejetée presque un an plus tard. Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que le défaut d'avoir octroyer l'aide juridique à la mère ne violait ni l'art. 7 ni l'art. 15(1). Il a estimé qu'il n'était pas essentiel que l'appelante soit représentée par avocat pour que l'audience soit équitable et que l'absence de services d'avocats rémunérés par l'État ne portait pas atteinte au droit à la liberté de la mère. L'appel formé par la mère a été rejeté. La Cour d'appel a conclu, à la majorité, que le fait que la mère ne soit pas représentée par avocat n'enfreignait pas l'art. 7 puisque la liberté parentale n'était pas protégée par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Elle a estimé que les dispositions de la Loi sur les services à la famille , dans la mesure où elles étaient appliquées, étaient raisonnablement conformes aux normes constitutionnelles. Les juges majoritaires ont par ailleurs estimé qu'en accueillant l'appel la cour aurait exercé une fonction législative, ce qui aurait constitué une ingérence des tribunaux dans la définition de la portée du régime d'aide juridique et son application. La mère a formé un pourvoi.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi a été accueilli.

Le juge en chef Lamer (les juges Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Major et Binnie y souscrivant) : La mère était représentée par avocat lors de l'audition de la requête relative à la garde, l'ordonnance de garde avait pris fin et la mère avait recouvré la garde de ses enfants. La question en litige était devenue purement théorique. La Cour a toutefois jugé qu'elle se devait d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire afin de statuer sur l'affaire et d'examiner les questions juridiques posées même si le pourvoi était devenu théorique. Il s'agissait d'un débat contradictoire, et l'appel a été débattu à fond et avec vigueur par les deux parties. La question de savoir si un père ou une mère a le droit d'être représenté par un avocat aux frais de l'État lors de l'audition d'un litige portant sur la garde d'enfants constituait sans conteste une question d'importance nationale et qui était susceptible d'échapper à l'examen des tribunaux. La Cour n'outrepassait pas son rôle institutionnel en entendant le pourvoi. Il fallait procéder à l'analyse des questions en appel comme si l'audience relative à la garde n'avait pas encore eu lieu et que la mère n'y avait pas été représentée par avocat. L'analyse des questions en litige devait être fait de façon prospective et non rétrospective.

La requête pour prorogation présentée par le ministre menaçait de restreindre le droit de la mère à la sécurité de sa personne garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés . Le droit à la sécurité de la personne protège « à la fois l'intégrité physique et psychologique de la personne ». Pour qu'une restriction de la sécurité de la personne soit établie, il faut que l'acte contesté ait des répercussions graves et profondes sur l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne. Il convient de procéder à une évaluation objective des répercussions de l'ingérence de l'État, en particulier de son incidence sur l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne ayant une sensibilité raisonnable. Il n'est pas nécessaire qu'une telle ingérence ait entraîné un choc nerveux ou un trouble psychiatrique, mais ses répercussions doivent être plus importantes qu'une simple tension ou une angoisse ordinaire. Le fait pour l'État de retirer aux parents la garde des enfants constitue une grave ingérence qui porte atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique du père et de la mère. La séparation d'un parent de son enfant aurait des répercussions profondes tant sur l'enfant que sur le parent. L'ingérence directe de l'État dans le lien parent-enfant, par le biais d'une procédure dans laquelle le lien est examiné et contrôlé par l'État, constitue une intrusion flagrante dans un domaine privé et intime. La honte et l'affliction qui résultent de la perte de la qualité de parent constituent une conséquence particulièrement grave.

La restriction potentielle du droit de la mère à la sécurité de sa personne aurait été contraire aux principes de justice fondamentale si elle n'avait pas été représentée par un avocat à l'audience relative à la garde. L'article 7 garantit à chacun des parents le droit à une audience équitable lorsque l'État cherche à obtenir la garde de leurs enfants. Pour qu'une audience soit équitable, le père ou la mère doivent avoir l'occasion de soumettre efficacement leurs prétentions. La participation efficace du parent à l'audience est nécessaire dans le cas où le parent cherche à conserver la garde de son enfant. Si le parent se voit refuser l'occasion de participer efficacement à l'audience, le juge peut se trouver dans l'impossibilité de déterminer avec précision l'intérêt supérieur de l'enfant. Dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, le droit de la mère à une audience équitable exigeait qu'elle soit représentée par un avocat. La nécessité qu'un parent soit représenté par avocat est directement proportionnelle à l'importance et à la complexité de l'instance et inversement proportionnelle aux capacités du parent. Une instance relative à la garde des enfants est une instance contradictoire et les parties sont responsables de la préparation et de la présentation de leur cause. Des questions de preuve compliquées sont souvent soulevées. Le parent doit soumettre des éléments de preuve, procéder au contre-interrogatoire des témoins, formuler des objections et présenter des moyens de défense prévus par la loi dans un contexte qui lui est inconnu, alors qu'il est en proie à une importante tension émotionnelle. Dans des instances aussi importantes et complexes que celle-ci, le parent qui n'est pas représenté par un avocat devrait être doté d'une intelligence ou d'une éducation supérieures, de talents de communicateur et connaître le système juridique pour être en mesure de présenter efficacement sa cause. Aucun élément de preuve n'a été soumis pour démontrer que la mère possédait de tels attributs. La violation possible de l'art. 7 aurait résulté du défaut du gouvernement de fournir à la mère un avocat rémunéré par l'État dans le cadre de son programme d'aide juridique après avoir entamé les procédures.

La contravention à la Charte ne résultait pas de la loi elle-même. Celle-ci prévoit clairement la fourniture des services d'un avocat payé par l'État. La contravention résultait plutôt de la décision prise par un décideur à qui on avait délégué l'application de la loi de ne pas couvrir ce type de procédure. Les coûts supplémentaires qu'engendrerait la prestation de tels services ne sont pas suffisants pour constituer une justification à la restriction et à la contravention au sens de l'art. 1 de la Charte. Le droit d'un parent à une audience équitable dans les cas où l'État cherche à lui retirer la garde de ses enfants l'emporte sur les modestes économies réalisées par l'État. La réparation qui empiéterait le moins serait de ne pas apporter de modification à la ligne de conduite adoptée, sous réserve du pouvoir discrétionnaire dévolu au juge de première instance d'ordonner de façon ponctuelle la fourniture des services d'un avocat rémunéré par l'État lorsqu'une telle mesure est nécessaire pour assurer l'équité d'une audience relative à la garde d'enfants. La procédure visant à déterminer la nécessité tiendrait compte de la gravité des intérêts en jeu, de la complexité de l'instance et des capacités du parent.

Le juge L'Heureux-Dubé (les juges Gonthier et McLachlin y souscrivant) : La présente affaire soulève indubitablement la question de l'égalité des sexes puisque les femmes, et surtout les mères célibataires, sont touchées de façon disproportionnée et particulière par les procédures relatives à la protection des enfants. La tendance des relations vécues dans le cadre du mariage fait en sorte que les femmes assument, de façon disproportionnée, le soin des enfants, qu'elles renoncent à des possibilités d'avancement, sur le plan financier, dans le marché du travail et qu'elles souffrent de dénuement économique, par voie de conséquence. Les questions qui concernent les parents pauvres touchent nécessairement les femmes de façon disproportionnée. Les principes d'égalité garantis par l'art. 15 de même que par l'art. 28 de la Charte ont une grande influence sur l'interprétation de la portée de la protection offerte par l'art. 7. Dans le cadre de l'examen des droits accordés par l'art. 7 qui sont en cause et des principes de justice fondamentale qui s'appliquent à ce cas, il est primordial de s'assurer que l'analyse tienne compte des principes et des objectifs de la garantie du droit à l'équité en favorisant le bénéfice égal de la protection de la loi et en s'assurant que la loi réponde aux besoins des personnes et des groupes défavorisés que vise à protéger l'art. 15.

Le processus de prise de décisions des parents de même que les autres attributs de la garde sont protégés au nom du droit à la liberté prévu à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Compte tenu de l'importance de son identité en tant que parent, du grave traumatisme et du stress psychologique qui sont causés par le retrait d'un enfant de son foyer, le droit d'un parent à la sécurité de sa personne est enfreint si son enfant est retiré du foyer familial en raison de la suppression du pouvoir du parent d'en prendre soin. Le juge de première instance n'a pas tenu suffisamment compte des valeurs relatives à la participation valable à l'audience touchant les droits de l'enfant ni de la complexité de la présente affaire et des problèmes que rencontrerait la mère dans la présentation de sa cause. Un juge de première instance doit tenir compte de la gravité des intérêts en jeu, de la complexité des procédures et des caractéristiques du parent touché pour déterminer si le parent est apte à participer de façon efficace à l'audience.Les juges devraient tenir compte du fait que les demandes d'ordonnances temporaires font souvent partie d'un processus qui mène à des ordonnances permanentes et qu'ils doivent nécessairement soupeser la gravité des procédures eu égard aux intérêts à court terme et à long terme des parents touchés. La longueur des procédures, le genre d'éléments de preuve soumis, le nombre de témoins, de même que la complexité et le caractère technique des procédures doivent constituer des considérations importantes dans le cadre de l'évaluation de la complexité globale des procédures. Les tribunaux doivent tout particulièrement prendre soin d'éviter d'inclure dans le test des facteurs susceptibles de rendre plus difficile la tâche du parent de présenter sa cause au fond. L'accent devrait être mis sur le niveau d'instruction du parent, ses aptitudes linguistiques, sa facilité de communication, son âge et autres indicateurs du même genre.

Annotation

We have to thank pig-headed, penny-pinching provincial governments like New Brunswick for creating "good" test cases like New Brunswick (Minister of Health & Community Services) v. G. (J.) . But it took eleven years for a test case to get to the Supreme Court of Canada. It was April 1988 when the McKenna Liberal government abolished civil legal aid in New Brunswick. Even today, as the court makes clear (at paras. 18 to 23), the New Brunswick legal aid plan is shockingly inadequate. Hundreds of parents have been denied represention over the past decade.

This policy and these facts moved the Supreme Court to hold that the New Brunswick government was under a constitutional obligation to provide state-funded counsel in child protection proceedings, to ensure a fair hearing consistent with s. 7 of the Charter . Whether counsel will be required depends upon the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the parent. If counsel is not provided, then a trial judge has the power to order the government to provide state-funded counsel under s. 24(1) of the Charter .

Beneath the cautious language can be found two major developments in s. 7 law. First, the court has unanimously extended s. 7 protection into the civil setting, beyond criminal law and beyond "physical liberty". Second, the court has ordered the state to act, to spend money, to provide funding for counsel for a parent before the courts. I want to explore the doctrinal and practical implications of this decision. Whole new issues and arguments have now opened up, in child protection and other fields of civil and family law.

Section 7 Doctrine

For the majority, Chief Justice Lamer uses "security of the person" as the foundation for a parent's claim to protection under s. 7 of the Charter. "State removal of a child from parental custody" has "a serious and profound effect on a person's psychological integrity": the loss of companionship of the child, the "gross intrusion into a private and intimate sphere", the stigmatization as an "unfit" parent, the impact of the loss of parental status upon personal identity. In this holding, the court has extended and reaffirmed much of what was said by La Forest J. in B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto (1994), 9 R.F.L. (4th) 157, 21 O.R. (3d) 479 (note), 122 D.L.R. (4th) 1, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315, 26 C.R.R. (2d) 202, 176 N.R. 161, 78 O.A.C. 1 .

But Justice La Forest relied upon "liberty" as the foundation for his s. 7 analysis. Those reasons attracted the support of three Justices in B. (R.) : L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. The same trio continue to adhere to those strong views of "liberty", as is made clear in Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's separate concurring judgment. And I would note that, as the author of the dissenting opinion in the New Brunswick Court of Appeal, Justice Bastarache also relied upon the parent's "liberty" interest.

What is clear is that six members of the seven-judge panel were prepared to unite under the "security of the person" heading, to find a potential infringement of s. 7. Left for another day is the scope of "liberty". Lamer C.J.C. makes clear that "s. 7 is not limited solely to purely criminal or penal matters" (para. 65), an important clarification that was not apparent from his narrow opinion in B. (R.) .

In future, those using s. 7 for a Charter challenge in protection proceedings should now found their arguments upon "security of the person". The same "liberty" points made by La Forest J. in B. (R.) can be used as "security" arguments.

Under the heading of "principles of fundamental justice" (in para. 70), Chief Justice Lamer provides a short and telling statement of the law, that is sure to be quoted often:

Thus, the principles of fundamental justice in child protection proceedings are both substantive and procedural. The state may only relieve a parent of custody when it is necessary to protect the best interests of the child, provided that there is a fair procedure for making this determination.

In this case, procedural arguments were made, but there is also substantive content to the principles of fundamental justice, a reminder for counsel looking to challenge protection laws. There is a healthy amount of "substantive" commentary in both judgments in G. (J.) that should not be overlooked, especially when read together with B. (R.) .

On the procedural point, note that Lamer C.J.C. emphasises not just "fairness" to the parent, but also the greater accuracy in fact-finding and decision-making that comes from effective parental participation in the hearing (at para. 73). For those arguing for fair procedures under s. 7, it is useful to hitch one's arguments to this broader, less self-interested purpose.

Practical implications for legal aid in protection cases

Every legal aid plan in Canada gives top priority on the civil side to representation of parents in protection proceedings. Outside of New Brunswick, the immediate effects of G. (J.) will be modest. All plans should review their child protection coverage, though, to make sure they comply with the directives of the Supreme Court. Further, the decision here will serve as a significant bulwark for protection cases against any future cuts to legal aid funding and services.

New Brunswick provided coverage only for "guardianship" hearings, the equivalent of Ontario's Crown wardship or Nova Scotia's permanent care and custody. Mind you, the certificate maximum (inclusive of disbursements) was a paltry $1,000. Coverage was not provided for any other hearing, including any extensions of "custody" orders as in J.G.'s case, what Ontario would call society wardship or Nova Scotia would call temporary care and custody. Chief Justice Lamer sets out three factors to guide the need for counsel: the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the parent. What becomes apparent from his analysis of these "factors" is that counsel will almost always be required in every protection hearing, a view supported by the helpful detailed suggestions of L'Heureux-Dubé J. As her concurring opinion states (at para. 125), in those understated double negatives favoured by judges, "it is likely that the situations in which counsel will be required will not necessarily be rare".

The third factor really foreordains the result in most protection cases. States Lamer C.J.C. (at para. 80):

In proceedings as serious and complex as these, an unrepresented parent will ordinarily need to possess superior intelligence or education, communication skills, composure, and familiarity with the legal system in order to effectively present his or her case.

Most parents in protection cases are profoundly disadvantaged - poor, uneducated, often illiterate, and often suffering from disabilities like mental illness, addictions, etc. Essentially, this means that most judges should start from the assumption that all but the most rare parents will require counsel.

The second factor looks to the complexity of the hearing. Lamer C.J.C. recognises that these cases are "effectively adversarial proceedings", but suggests that there may be "simple" cases that don't require counsel. A quick look at modern Canadian protection statutes will demonstrate just how complex these cases are, and just how few hearings are "very short, involve relatively simple questions of fact and credibility, and have no expert reports" (para. 88). Only in this latter setting might counsel be unnecessary, assuming "superior" parental abilities.

The first factor looks to the seriousness of the interests at stake. The Chief Justice looks to the length of the proposed future separation, considered in light of any period of past separation (para. 77). Here a six-month temporary "custody" order, after a year of separation, was "a significant period of time" for J.G.'s young children. An important point is made by L'Heureux-Dubé J., namely, that temporary orders begin the slow march to permanent wardship (para. 121). I would add here that counsel is also critical at the very first hearing or appearance after an apprehension, where the separation process begins and the tone is set for the rest of the proceeding.

Practically, it will be very rare that a parent can appear without counsel under this three-factor test. A parent would have to be possessed of "superior" skills, the facts would have to be simple with no experts, and the state would have to be asking for only a supervision order. In my years of experience in this field, I can count the number of these cases on one hand, with fingers to spare.

For most legal aid plans, it will be simplest to provide counsel in all protection cases for all hearings, as is the general practice today. It is not worth the time, cost and delay of legal assessment or court assessment to ferret out the few cases that would not require counsel. Although the Supreme Court has framed the test in neutral terms, to be met by the parent seeking counsel, it is clear that the test leans heavily towards providing counsel in every case. Trial judges will be content to direct the provision of counsel, to assist them in hearing and deciding these difficult cases, and their right-to-counsel decisions will be treated deferentially by appeal courts.

Implications for other civil and family matters

Lamer C.J.C. makes clear that his comments and the remedy of state-funded counsel are limited to child protection proceedings (para. 104). In these proceedings, the state moves directly and as a party to intervene in the parent-child relationship. Obviously, G. (J.) should be read closely by legal aid plan administrators, judges and defence counsel for its criminal implications. Here I want to look to the "civil" implications, first for child protection cases, for other family law matters, and then for other civil matters.

The Supreme Court has reaffirmed that "the principles of fundamental justice in child protection proceedings are both substantive and procedural". Elsewhere I and others have canvassed the constitutional issues that can arise in protection proceedings: Thompson, "A Family Law Hitchhiker's Guide to the Charter Galaxy" (1988), 3 C.F.L.Q. 315 at 367-382; "Why Hasn't the Charter Mattered in Child Protection?" (1989), 8 Can.J.Fam.L. 133; "Revenge of the Charter: 'Public' and 'Private' in Family Law" in 1996 National Family Law Program (Ottawa, 1996); Zylberberg, "Minimum Constitutional Guarantees in Child Protection Cases" (1992), 10 Can.J.Fam.L. 257; Bala and Redfearn, "Family Law and the 'Liberty Interest': Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights" (1983), 15 Ottawa L.Rev. 274. Included would be: warrantless apprehension; post-apprehension interim procedures; illegally obtained evidence; maximum time limits on temporary orders; trial within a reasonable time; the breadth and vagueness of the definition of "child in need of protection"; the constitutional limits of any test for permanent wardship; rights of foster parents; rights of children in care; freedom of association as a separate source of constitutional rights.

The Supreme Court will soon hear a case raising constitutional issues surrounding warrantless apprehension, in a case granted leave in October of 1998: Winnipeg Child & Family Services (Central Area) v. W. (K.L.), 231 N.R. 393 (note), 138 Man. R. (2d) 70 (note), 202 W.A.C. 70 (note) (S.C.C.) , [1998] S.C.C.A. No. 361, respecting the appeal decision reported at (1998), 41 R.F.L. (4th) 291, 167 W.A.C. 315, 126 Man. R. (2d) 315 (C.A.) .

What of conventional "family law" proceedings?

Imprisonment for non-payment of support clearly implicates s. 7's protection of "physical liberty", as I have pointed out previously: Thompson, "Charter Galaxy", above, 383-4; Wright v. Wright (October 11, 1990), Doc. Richmond 00388 (B.C. Prov. Ct.) , [1990] W.D.F.L. 1293 , [1990] B.C.J. 2290.

The references to "custody" in G. (J.) must be read in the context of child protection "custody" orders under the New Brunswick Family Services Act , and not "private" custody. What's distinctive about protection proceedings is the direct involvement of the state as a party. It may be possible to argue for state-funded counsel in "private" custody matters where the state plays a more direct role, e.g. defending Hague Convention applications (where the state has conduct of the proceedings), and some adoption proceedings. See Thompson, "Charter Galaxy", above, 355, for some exceptional U.S. and European cases on right to counsel in such matters.

If the termination of the parent-child relationship implicates s. 7's security of the person, what of the establishment of the parent-child relationship, as in paternity cases? In the United States, paternity cases have attracted much constitutional "liberty" litigation over fair procedures: Thompson, "Charter Galaxy", above, 348-50.

Outside of the family law setting, there are some civil spheres opened up for protection by s. 7 and possible right to state-funded counsel after this decision. Chief Justice Lamer kindly identifies one such case: where the government "can deprive a person of their s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person, i.e. civil committal to a mental institution" (para. 65). Most legal aid plans do not provide counsel for civil commitment hearings, but that will have to change in light of G. (J.) .

More broadly, I believe G. (J.) opens up to constitutional litigation the non-provision of a wide range of government benefits and services. In these cases, the denial is by the state, directly, and can have "a serious and profound effect on a person's psychological integrity": the denial or termination of social assistance to someone in need; eviction from public housing; disconnection of monopoly electric or gas service; refusal of necessary medical or hospital services; and, yes, even the denial of legal aid services. Where benefits or services are denied to parents with children and persons with disabilities, a large chunk of the poor population, the s. 7 arguments will be just as powerful as in the child protection field. For poverty lawyers, G. (J.) is now the starting point for arguments about procedural — and substantive — "fundamental justice".

Nous devons remercier les gouvernements bornés et radins tel celui du Nouveau-Brunswick, pour avoir présenté un « bon » cas ayant fait jurisprudence, Nouveau Brunswick (Ministre de la santé & des services communautaires) c. G. (J.) . Mais il a fallu onze ans avant qu'un tel cas ne se rende jusqu'à la Cour suprême du Canada. C'est en avril 1988 que le gouvernement libéral de McKenna a aboli l'aide juridique en matière civile au Nouveau-Brunswick. Même aujourd'hui, comme la Cour l'affirme clairement (aux par. 18 à 23), le régime d'aide juridique du Nouveau-Brunswick est manifestement inadéquat. Des centaines de parents n'ont pas obtenu d'être représentés au cours de la dernière décennie.

Ce régime et ces faits ont incité la Cour suprême à déclarer que le gouvernement du Nouveau-Brunswick avait l'obligation constitutionnelle de fournir à ses frais un conseiller juridique dans le cadre d'instances en matière de protection de la jeunesse, de manière à assurer une audience juste et conforme à l'art. 7 de la Charte . La question de savoir si les services d'un avocat seront requis dépend des intérêts en jeu, de la complexité des procédures et de la capacité des parents. En cas de refus, le juge du procès a le pouvoir d'ordonner au gouvernement de fournir un avocat rémunéré par l'État en vertu du par. 24(1) de la Charte .

Sous le langage prudent se trouvent deux développements majeurs relativement à l'état du droit sur l'art. 7. D'abord, la Cour a, unanimement, étendu la protection de l'art. 7 au cadre civil, au-delà du droit criminel et de la « liberté physique ». Deuxièmement, la Cour a ordonné à l'État d'agir, de dépenser des sommes, dans le but de libérer des fonds pour fournir un conseiller aux parents devant les tribunaux. Je désire approfondir les implications doctrinales et pratiques de cet arrêt. Des questions et des arguments nouveaux se posent désormais en matière de protection de la jeunesse ainsi que dans d'autres domaines du droit civil et familial.

La doctrine relative à l'article 7

Rédigeant l'opinion majoritaire, le juge en chef Lamer fonde la réclamation du droit d'un parent à la protection en vertu de l'art. 7 sur la « sécurité de la personne ». « Le retrait de la garde d'un enfant par l'État ... porte gravement atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique du parent »: la perte de la compagnie de l'enfant, « l'intrusion flagrante dans un domaine privé et intime », la stigmatisation des parents comme étant « inaptes », l'impact de la perte du statut parental, lequel est souvent fondamental à l'identité personnelle. Par sa position, la Cour a étendu et confirmé la plupart de ce qu'a écrit le juge La Forest dans l'arrêt B.

Mais le juge La Forest a fondé son analyse de l'art. 7 sur la « liberté ». Ses motifs ont recueilli l'assentiment de trois juges dans B. (R.) : les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier et McLachlin. Ces derniers continuent à adhérer à cette vision ferme de la « liberté », tel qu'il ressort clairement de l'opinion rendue séparément par la juge L'Heureux-Dubé. Et j'ajouterais qu'en tant qu'auteur de l'opinion dissidente de la Cour d'appel du Nouveau Brunswick, le juge Bastarache se fonde également sur le droit à la « liberté » des parents.

Ce qui est clair c'est que six des sept juges formant le banc étaient prêts à s'unir sous la bannière de la « sécurité de la personne », pour conclure à une atteinte potentielle à l'art. 7. On a remis l'analyse de la portée de la « liberté » à un autre jour. Le juge en chef Lamer énonce clairement que « l'art. 7 n'est pas limité aux affaires purement criminelles ou pénales » (par. 65), une clarification importante qui n'était pas apparente à la lecture de son opinion, plutôt étroite, dans B. (R.) .

À l'avenir, ceux qui utiliseront l'art. 7 dans le cadre d'une contestation en vertu de la Charte , lors de procédures en matière de protection, devraient dorénavant fonder leurs arguments sur la « sécurité de la personne ». Les points soulevés par le juge La Forest dans B. (R.) relativement à la « liberté » peuvent servir à l'argumentation concernant la « sécurité ».

Sous le titre de « principes de justice fondamentale » (au par. 70), le juge en chef Lamer fournit un court et instructif état du droit, lequel fera très certainement l'objet de nombreuses citations:

En conséquence, les principes de justice fondamentale dans les instances concernant la protection des enfants intéressent autant le fond que la procédure. L'État ne peut retirer au parent la garde de son enfant que si cela s'avère nécessaire pour protéger l'intérêt supérieur de l'enfant, pourvu que cette décision soit prise selon une procédure équitable.

Dans cette affaire, des arguments de nature procédurale ont été soulevés, mais on a également fait face à la substance des principes de justice fondamentale, dont les avocats doivent tenir compte au moment de chercher à contester une loi en matière de protection. Il existe une quantité saine de commentaires substantifs dans les deux jugement G. (J.) qui mérite attention, particulièrement lorsque lus en parallèle avec B. (R.)).

Relativement à l'aspect procédural, il faut observer que le juge en chef Lamer met l'accent non seulement sur l'« équité » à l'égard du parent, mais aussi sur la précision que l'on gagne au niveau de la recherche factuelle ainsi qu'au niveau de la prise de décision, au moyen de la participation efficace des parents au cours de l'audience (au par. 73). Il peut être utile à ceux qui argumenteront en faveur de procédures équitables en vertu de l'art. 7 de lier une de ses prétentions à cet objet plus large et moins intéressé.

Implications pratiques de l'aide juridique dans le cadre d'affaires en matière de protection

Tous les régimes d'aide juridique au Canada ont comme priorité, dans le domaine civil, d'assurer la représentation des parents dans le cadre de procédures en protection. À l'extérieur du Nouveau-Brunswick, l'effet immédiat de G. (J.) sera modeste. Cependant, tous les régimes devront réviser la couverture offerte en matière de protection de l'enfant de manière à s'assurer de satisfaire aux directives de la Cour suprême. En outre, cet arrêt servira, à l'égard des affaires de protection, de rempart contre de futures compressions dans le financement et la prestation de services du régime d'aide juridique.

Au Nouveau-Brunswick, la couverture ne s'appliquait qu'aux audiences portant sur la garde, soit l'équivalent de la tutelle de la Couronne en Ontario, ou de la garde permanente en Nouvelle-Écosse. Par ailleurs, le montant maximum du certificat, incluant les déboursés, atteignait un maigre 1 000 $. La couverture n'était fournie pour aucun autre type d'audiences, même celles découlant d'un prolongement d'une ordonnance de garde, comme c'était le cas dans l'affaire J.G., ce qu'on nommerait en Ontario une « society wardship », ou ce qui constituerait une garde temporaire en Nouvelle-Écosse. Le juge en chef Lamer énonce trois critères destinés à servir de guide au moment de décider de la nécessité de fournir un conseiller: l'importance des droits en cause, la complexité des procédures, et la capacité du parent. Ce qui se révèle apparent à l'analyse de ces critères, c'est que l'assistance d'un conseiller s'avérera presque toujours requise dans chaque audience en matière de protection, point de vue appuyé par les suggestions détaillées et utiles fournies par la juge L'Heureux-Dubé. Tel que cité dans son opinion (au par. 125), dans une formule utilisant la double négation tant prisée par les magistrats, « il est probable que les cas où la présence d'un avocat sera requise ne seront pas nécessairement rares ».

Le troisième critère aura un effet prédestiné sur le résultat de la plupart des affaires de protection. Le juge en chef Lamer déclare (au par. 80):

Dans des instances aussi importantes et complexes, le parent non représenté devra, en général, être très intelligent ou très instruit, posséder d'excellentes capacités de communication ainsi que beaucoup de sang-froid et bien connaître le système judiciaire pour pouvoir présenter efficacement sa cause.

La majorité des parents dans les affaires de protection sont profondément désavantagés; ils sont souvent pauvres, illettrés, et fréquemment atteint de maladie mentale, toxicomanie, etc. Cela signifie essentiellement que les juges devraient présumer au départ que l'ensemble des parents, à de rares exceptions près, auront besoin d'un avocat.

Le second critère touche la complexité de l'audience. Le juge en chef Lamer reconnaît que ces causes constituent « réellement des instances contradictoires », mais il suggère qu'il peut y avoir des cas simples qui ne requièrent pas d'avocat. Un survol des lois canadiennes en matière de protection démontrera la complexité de ces causes et le fait que très peu de celles-ci peuvent être « très courtes, soulever des questions de fait ou de crédibilité relativement simples et ne pas comporter de rapports d'experts » (par. 88). C'est seulement dans ces derniers cas que le recours à un avocat pourra ne pas s'avérer nécessaire, en assumant que les parents ont des habilités supérieures.

Le premier facteur concerne la gravité des intérêts en jeu. Le Juge en chef étudie la durée de la séparation proposée à la lumière des périodes antérieures de séparation (par. 77). En l'espèce, une ordonnance temporaire de garde de six (6) mois après un an de séparation fut considérée « comme étant d'une durée significative » pour les jeunes enfants de J.G. Un point important établi par la Juge L'Heureux-Dubé est à l'effet que les ordonnances temporaires sont le début d'une longue marche vers la tutelle permanente (par. 121). J'ajouterai que le recours à l'avocat est critique au tout début de l'audience ou de la comparution, après une crainte de partialité, ou au début de la procédure de séparation où est établie l'atmosphère pour le reste de l'audience.

En pratique, il sera très rare qu'un parent puisse se présenter sans avocat en respectant les trois critères du test. Un parent devra posséder des habilités supérieures, le cas devra être simple et ne pas comporter d'expertise, et l'État ne devra demander qu'une ordonnance de supervision. De toutes mes années d'expérience dans ce domaine, je peux compter de tels cas sur les doigts d'une main, avec des doigts en trop.

Pour la plupart des régimes d'aide juridique, il serait plus simple de fournir un avocat dans tous les cas de protection pour toutes les audiences comme le veut la pratique actuelle. Il ne vaut la peine, le coût et le délai de la détermination juridique ou judiciaire de dénicher les quelques cas qui ne nécessiteraient pas l'assistance d'un avocat. Même si la Cour suprême a encadré le test en utilisant des termes neutres, auxquels doivent satisfaire les parents recherchant les conseils d'un avocat, il est clair que le test penche grandement pour la représentation par avocat dans tous les cas. Les juges de procès se contenteront de suggérer la présence d'un avocat pour les aider durant l'audience et pour trancher ces cas difficiles. Leurs décisions concernant l'assistance d'un avocat seront traitées avec déférence par les Cours d'appel.

Implication sur les autres aspects du droit familial et civil

Le Juge en chef Lamer tient des propos clairs et l'utilisation d'avocats financés par l'État est limitée aux cas de protection des enfants (par. 104). Dans ces procédures, l'État devient directement une partie qui intervient dans la relation parent-enfant. Évidemment, G. (J.) devrait être lu attentivement par les administrateurs des régimes d'aide juridique, les juges et les avocats de la défense pour ses implications en droit criminel. En l'espèce, je veux analyser les implications en droit civil, premièrement pour les cas de protection de l'enfant, pour les autres cas en droit familial et ensuite pour les autres affaires de droit civil.

La Cour suprême a réaffirmé que « les principes de justice fondamentale dans les cas de protection de l'enfant relèvent à la fois du droit substantif et procédural ». Ailleurs, j'ai analysé avec d'autres les aspects constitutionnels qui peuvent émaner des cas de protection: « A Family Law Hitchhiker's Guide to the Charter Galaxy », (1988), 3 C.F.L.Q. 315 at 367-382; «

Why Hasn't the Charter Mattered in Child Protection? » (1989), 8 Can.J.Fam.L. 133; « Revenge of the Charter: "Public" and "Private" in Family Law » dans 1996 National Family Law Program (Ottawa, 1996); Zylberberg, « Minimum Constitutional Guarantees in Child Protection Cases » (1992), 10 Can. J. Fam. L. 257; Bala et Redfearn, « Family Law and the "Liberty Interest": Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights » (1983), 15 Ottawa L.Rev. 274. Incluse serait la crainte de partialité injustifiée; la crainte de partialité postérieure aux procédures intérimaires; la preuve obtenue illégalement; les limites de temps maximums des ordonnances temporaires; le procès à l'intérieur d'un délai raisonnable; la portée et l'imprécision des définitions de « l'enfant qui a besoin de protection »; les limites constitutionnelles de tout test pour la garde permanente; le droit des parents adoptifs; le droit des enfants sous soins; la liberté d'association en tant que source séparée des droits constitutionnels.

La Cour suprême entendra bientôt un cas soulevant les questions constitutionnelles entourant la crainte de partialité injustifiée, dans la cause dont l'autorisation de pourvoi a été accordée au mois d'octobre dernier: Winnipeg Child & Family Services (Central Area) c. W. (K.L.), 231 N.R. 393 (note), 138 Man. R. (2d) 70 (note), 202 W.A.C. 70 (note) (C.S.C.) , (1998) S.C.C.A. no 361, concernant l'appel d'une décision publiée à (1998), 41 R.F.L. (4e) 291, 167 W.A.C. 315, 126 Man. R. (2d) 315 (C.A.) .

Qu'en est-il des procédures conventionnelles en « droit de la famille »? L'emprisonnement pour le défaut de payer la pension alimentaire implique la notion énoncée à l'art. 7 concernant la protection de « la liberté physique », tel que mentionné précédemment: « Charter Galaxy », supra, à 383-4; Wright c. Wright (11 octobre 1990), no Richmond 00388 (C. prov. C.B.), [1990] W.D.F.L. 1293 , [1990] B.C.J. 2290.

Les références à la « garde » dans G. (J.) doivent être lues dans le contexte de la protection de l'enfant dans les ordonnances de garde sous la Loi sur les services familiaux du Nouveau-Brunswick et non ceux de la garde « privée », ce qui est particulier des procédures de protection est l'implication directe de l'État en tant que partie. Il peut être possible de plaider en faveur d'un avocat rémunéré par l'État dans les cas de garde « privée » lorsque l'État joue un rôle plus direct, i.e.: l'application de la convention de la Haye (où l'État a la conduite des procédures) et quelques procédures d'adoption. Voir Thompson, « Charter Galaxy », supra, 355, pour des cas exceptionnels américains et européens au droit à l'avocat lors de telles causes.

Lorsque la fin de la relation parent-enfant implique les notions de sécurité de la personne et de l'art. 7, qu'en est-il de l'établissement de la relation parent-enfant telle que dans les affaires de paternité? Aux États-Unis, les cas de paternité ont attiré plusieurs litiges concernant la « liberté » constitutionnelle relativement aux procédures équitables: Thompson, « Charter Galaxy », supra, 348-50.

Hors les domaines du droit de la famille, il y a quelques sphères du droit civil où le droit à la protection édicté à l'art. 7 pourrait permettre, depuis cette décision, d'obtenir un avocat rémunéré par l'État. Le Juge en chef Lamer identifie avec égard un tel cas: lorsque « l'État peut priver un individu du droit à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'article 7, par exemple l'internement dans un établissement psychiatrique » (par. 65). La plupart des programmes d'aide juridique ne prévoient pas le droit à l'avocat pour les cas de procédures relatives aux incarcérations civiles, mais cela devra être modifié à la lumière de la décision G. (J.) .

De façon générale, je crois que G. (J.) ouvre la porte à la contestation constitutionnelle du refus de fournir un grand nombre de services et prestations gouvernementales. Dans ces cas, le refus émane directement de l'État et peut avoir « un impact sérieux et profond sur l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne »: le refus ou l'arrêt de l'assistance sociale à quelqu'un dans le besoin; l'éviction d'un logement public, la coupure des services de monopole de gaz et d'électricité, le refus d'offrir les soins hospitaliers et médicaux nécessaires; et, bien sûr, même le refus du service d'aide juridique. Lorsque les bénéfices ou les services sont refusés aux parents et aux individus ayant des incapacités, lesquels représentent une partie importante de la population défavorisée, les arguments relatifs à l'art. 7 seront tout aussi puissants que dans les domaines de protection de l'enfant. Pour les avocats traitant de cas de pauvreté, G. (J.) constitue le point de départ d'arguments concernant la procédure et la substance de la « justice fondamentale ».

Lamer C.J.C.* (Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Major and Binnie JJ. concurring):

1 This case raises for the first time the issue of whether indigent parents have a constitutional right to be provided with state-funded counsel when a government seeks a judicial order suspending such parents' custody of their children. It comes before the Court as a result of Legal Aid New Brunswick's decision not to provide legal aid to the appellant after the Minister of Health and Community Services of New Brunswick sought to extend an order granting the Minister custody of the appellant's three children for an additional six months. The decision not to provide the appellant with legal aid was made pursuant to a policy in force at the time of her application which stipulated that no legal aid certificates would be issued to respondents in custody applications made by the Minister of Health and Community Services.

2 I have concluded that the government of New Brunswick was under a constitutional obligation to provide the appellant with state-funded counsel in the particular circumstances of this case. When government action triggers a hearing in which the interests protected by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are engaged, it is under an obligation to do whatever is required to ensure that the hearing be fair. In some circumstances, depending on the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the parent, the government may be required to provide an indigent parent with state-funded counsel. Where the government fails to discharge its constitutional obligation, a judge has the power to order the government to provide a parent with state-funded counsel under s. 24(1) of the Charter through whatever means the government wishes, be it through the Attorney General's budget, the consolidated funds of the province, or the budget of the legal aid system, if one is in place.

I - Factual Background

3 The appellant's three young children were placed in the care of the Minister of Health and Community Services of New Brunswick on November 12, 1993. On April 28, 1994 the Minister obtained an order under Part IV of the Family Services Act , S.N.B. 1980, c. F-2.2, granting him custody of the children for a period of up to six months. The appellant was not represented by counsel at the hearing, although she did have the assistance of a friend who did not have any legal training.

4 By notice of application served on the appellant on October 24, 1994, the Minister sought an extension of the order for a further period of up to six months. On October 27, 1994, at the initial appearance of the appellant, duty counsel appointed by the Minister of Justice to act on her behalf advised the court that the appellant intended to challenge the temporary custody application and therefore required a full hearing of the matter.

5 The appellant, who was indigent and receiving social assistance at the time, applied to Legal Aid New Brunswick for legal aid on November 1, 1994 and was advised the next day that her application was denied on the grounds that the proceeding involved a custody application , as opposed to a guardianship application by the Minister. At that time, custody applications were not covered under the legal aid guidelines; legal aid certificates were available only for guardianship applications.

6 On November 2, 1994, the appellant brought a motion for an order directing the Minister to provide her with sufficient funds to cover reasonable fees and disbursements of counsel for the purposes of preparing for and representing her in the custody proceedings or in the alternative, that either Legal Aid New Brunswick or the Attorney General of New Brunswick provide her with counsel. She also sought a declaration that the rules and policies governing the distribution of Domestic Legal Aid, as they differentiated between applications for guardianship and applications for custody orders (or their extension), were contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter . Subsequently, the motion was amended to include relief for a violation of s. 7 of the Charter .

7 November 3, 1994 was set aside to hear the motion. At the request of the Attorney General, an adjournment was granted until December 12, 1994. The motions judge, Athey J., also requested that the parties present their arguments by way of written brief.

8 In the week preceding the new hearing date, Athey J. advised counsel that she would be unable to determine the issue of the right to paid counsel prior to the date set for the custody application. It was agreed by counsel that the best interests of the children would be served by proceeding with the custody hearing on the originally scheduled date. Mr. Christie, who had been appointed duty counsel for the appellant and relieved of his role on November 8, 1994, agreed to represent the appellant at the custody hearing pro bono , in accordance with the highest standards of the profession. The parties also agreed that the motion would not be considered moot by virtue of Mr. Christie's representation of the appellant at the hearing.

9 The custody hearing was held December 19, 20 and 21, 1994. Athey J. granted an extension of the custody order on January 3, 1995. At the hearing, the Minister of Health and Community Services called testimony and presented affidavit evidence from 15 witnesses, including expert psychological reports. The Minister of Justice provided counsel for the Minister of Health and Community Services and, at the request of the court pursuant to s. 7(b) of the Family Services Act , the Attorney General provided counsel for the appellant's children. Mr. Danny Vezina, the father of one of the children, hired counsel to represent him.

10 In June of 1995, the children were returned to the care of the appellant. On December 15, 1995, over a year after the appellant's motion was brought, it was dismissed by Athey J. The appellant was granted leave to appeal. Her appeal was dismissed by the New Brunswick Court of Appeal on March 14, 1997.

II - The Legislative Scheme

11 The relevant sections of the Family Services Act are as follows:

> 1. ...
>
> "best interests of the child" means the best interests of the child under the circumstances taking into consideration
>
> (a) the mental, emotional and physical health of the child and his need for appropriate care or treatment, or both;
>
> (b) the views and preferences of the child, where such views and preferences can be reasonably ascertained;
>
> (c) the effect upon the child of any disruption of the child's sense of continuity;
>
> (d) the love, affection and ties that exist between the child and each person to whom the child's custody is entrusted, each person to whom access to the child is granted and, where appropriate, each sibling of the child;
>
> (e) the merits of any plan proposed by the Minister under which he would be caring for the child, in comparison with the merits of the child returning to or remaining with his parents;
>
> (f) the need to provide a secure environment that would permit the child to become a useful and productive member of society through the achievement of his full potential according to his individual capacity; and
>
> (g) the child's cultural and religious heritage;
>
> 53(2) When disposing of an application under this Part the court shall at all times place above all other considerations the best interests of the child.

12 The relevant sections of the Legal Aid Act , R.S.N.B. 1973, c. L-2, are as follows:

> 12 (1) Subject to the directions of the Provincial Director and policies established by the Law Society, an area director may issue legal aid certificates authorizing legal aid for proceedings and matters preliminary to anticipated proceedings
> (a) in respect of an offence under an Act of the Parliament of Canada or in respect of the Extradition Act , chapter E-21 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970 or the Fugitive Offenders Act chapter F-32 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970,
>
> (b) in respect of an offence under an Act of the Legislature,
>
> (c) before an administrative tribunal established by an Act of the Legislature or of the Parliament of Canada,
>
> (d) in bankruptcy,

(e) under the Divorce Act , chapter D-8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970, or the Divorce Act, 1985 , chapter 4 of the Statutes of Canada, 1986,

(f) other than those covered in paragraphs (a) to (e), in The Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick, the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, the Provincial Court, The Probate Court of New Brunswick, the Supreme Court of Canada or the Federal Court of Canada, and

(g) of an appellate nature in respect of matters and proceedings described in such of paragraphs (a) to (f) as are in force.

12 (14) Where the Law Society is of the opinion that the Legal Aid Fund is in danger of being depleted, it may, with the approval of the Minister, issue directions to the Provincial Director limiting the providing of legal aid in matters included in paragraphs (1)(c) to (g) and subsection (2).

24 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or the regulations, the Minister may establish and administer a program to provide legal aid for persons for proceedings and matters preliminary to anticipated proceedings

(a) under the Divorce Act , (Canada)

(b) other than those covered in paragraphs 12(1)(a) to 12(1)(e) in The Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick, the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, the Supreme Court of Canada or the Federal Court of Canada, and

(c) of an appellate nature in respect of matters and proceedings described in paragraphs (a) and (b).

13 The relevant sections of the Charter are as follows:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter , have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

14 To better understand both the factual context and the issues raised in this appeal, it may prove helpful to briefly review the Domestic Legal Aid program in New Brunswick. The statutory scheme and development of domestic legal aid in New Brunswick was ably described by both Athey J. in her reasons and by the parties, and I borrow from their accounts in what follows.

A. The Statutory Scheme

15 Under the Legal Aid Act , the Law Society is authorized to establish a plan known as Legal Aid New Brunswick, funded by both the government and the Law Foundation of New Brunswick. This plan is administered by the Law Society through the Provincial Director, who is appointed by the Law Society and is subject to its directions in all matters of policy and administration. The Law Society is responsible for establishing policies and regulations governing the administration of the plan. The Provincial Director in turn administers the plan in accordance with the regulations and policies established by the Law Society and directs the Area Directors concerning the performance of their duties.

16 Section 12(1) of the Legal Aid Act sets out the various judicial and administrative proceedings, both civil and criminal, which are eligible to receive legal aid certificates issued under the Act, subject to policies established by the Law Society and the directions of the Provincial Director. Pursuant to s. 12(14), where the Law Society is of the opinion that the Legal Aid Fund is in danger of being depleted, it may, with the approval of the Minister of Justice, issue directions to the Provincial Director limiting the provision of legal aid in certain matters. Among the matters in respect of which the Law Society is authorized to limit the provision of services are custody applications.

17 In 1993, the Legal Aid Act was amended to allow the Minister of Justice to establish and administer a program to provide domestic legal aid through the addition of Part II of the Act. Prior to that time, the Law Society and Legal Aid New Brunswick had exclusive jurisdiction over the provision of domestic legal aid and provided a limited service pursuant to the authority conferred by s. 12. Under s. 24(1) the Minister of Justice was granted the authority to establish a legal aid program notwithstanding any other provision of the Act or regulations, although the scope of this program is limited to civil matters. The result is a situation in which there is concurrent jurisdiction under the Legal Aid Act over the provision of domestic legal aid. As a matter of practice, however, domestic legal aid is provided almost exclusively by the Minister of Justice. One notable exception is guardianship applications, which are only covered by Legal Aid New Brunswick. Unlike Legal Aid New Brunswick, which uses a certificate system, the Minister of Justice operates a "staff model" of delivery whereby the Minister directly employs or enters into contracts with persons for the provision of legal aid.

B. The Development of the Domestic Legal Aid Program

18 In June 1988, the New Brunswick Law Foundation provided a grant to the Law Society to implement a domestic legal aid scheme and offer limited duty counsel service in Family Court. Certificates were only to be issued to applicants in cases where there were allegations against the applicant's spouse of spousal abuse, sexual abuse of the applicant's children, or "snatching" of children from the custodial parent. No certificates were to be issued to respondents to defend such allegations.

19 In December 1988, the Law Foundation agreed with the Law Society's request to expand the program to include parents subject to guardianship applications, but not custody applications by the Minister of Health and Community Services. In April 1989, the program was further expanded when the province of New Brunswick agreed to match the Law Foundation grant and double the budget of the Domestic Legal Aid program to $500,000.

20 Budgetary restraints necessitated a reduction in Domestic Legal Aid services in December 1991. On December 9, 1991, the Council of the Law Society, after having been made aware of the financial state of the program, decided that as of December 16, 1991 and until further notice certificates would only be issued for family violence and guardianship applications. In adopting this policy, the Law Society purported to act under the authority of s. 12(14).

21 In April 1993, the Domestic Legal Aid program underwent a major overhaul which significantly reduced the Law Society's involvement in the provision of domestic legal aid. With the addition of Part II of the Act, the bulk of domestic legal aid came under the direction of the Minister of Justice, which expanded the Unified Family Court program to provide more comprehensive socio-legal services.

22 Under the program offered by the Minister of Justice, everyone who needs counsel for the purposes of support orders is provided with the services of the Family Solicitor, who is paid by the Minister of Justice to provide legal services offered by the program. If there are allegations of abuse, a party will be able to use the services of the Family Solicitor for all legal matters that may arise between the parties, including custody, support, and divorce proceedings. The Minister also provides a limited duty counsel service, available to respondents on the day of their first appearance in Family Court proceedings initiated by the Crown. Mr. Christie was appointed duty counsel for the appellant pursuant to this aspect of the plan.

23 The Minister of Justice's program does not cover either guardianship or custody applications initiated by the Minister of Health and Community Services. This decision was made in order to avoid any potential conflicts of interest for Family Solicitors, who would be forced to act against the government while being paid by the Minister of Justice. In circumstances where the Minister of Health and Community Services applies for a permanent order of guardianship the provision of legal assistance is shifted to Legal Aid New Brunswick, which provides a legal aid certificate covering representation up to a limit of $1,000 to a qualified applicant. Prior to September 22, 1997 and at the time this case was initially heard, no legal aid was provided by either Legal Aid New Brunswick or the Minister of Justice to respondents in custody applications, except for the advice of duty counsel on the day of the first appearance. Since that time Legal Aid New Brunswick has adopted a new policy under which a legal aid certificate will be provided for the first custody hearing. Subsequent hearings for the extension of the original custody order, such as the one which is the subject of the present appeal, are still not eligible for a certificate, nor are they covered by the Minister of Justice's program.

III - Judgments Below

A. New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench (1995), 171 N.B.R. (2d) 185 (N.B. Q.B.)

24 Although the Minister's application had been heard and a determination made, counsel had agreed prior to the custody application that the appellant's motion to obtain state-funded counsel would not be considered moot if Athey J. was unable to decide the issue prior to the date set for the custody application. She therefore exercised her discretion to decide the motion.

25 Athey J. dismissed the appellant's s. 15 claim. Although she found that the legal aid system in New Brunswick did not provide respondents to ministerial applications for custody orders or extensions of those orders the same benefits granted to respondents to applications for guardianship orders, she concluded that the distinction between these two groups of respondents was not based on irrelevant personal characteristics enumerated in s. 15 or on any analogous grounds.

26 Turning to s. 7, Athey J. found that the appellant's liberty interest was engaged by the state when it removed her children from her care. She based her conclusion on La Forest J.'s decision in B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto (1994), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315 (S.C.C.) , where, in writing for three other justices, he held at para. 83 that "the right to nurture a child, to care for its development, and to make decisions for it in fundamental matters such as medical care, are part of the liberty interest of a parent".

27 Athey J. then considered whether the appellant would have been deprived of her right to liberty in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice were she unrepresented at the custody hearing. She referred again to La Forest J.'s reasons in B. (R) . where he held at para. 88 that

> [t]he protection of a child's right to life and to health, when it becomes necessary to do so, is a basic tenet of our legal system, and legislation to that end accords with the principles of fundamental justice, so long, of course, as it also meets the requirements of fair procedure.

She also cited Wilson J.'s judgment in Singh v. Canada (Minister of Employment & Immigration), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177 (S.C.C.) , for the proposition that fundamental justice includes the notion of procedural fairness articulated by Fauteux C.J. in R. v. Duke, [1972] S.C.R. 917 (S.C.C.) .

28 Applying these principles to the facts of this case, Athey J. concluded that there was no general right to paid counsel in a custody hearing because, in her opinion, it could not be said that parents can never adequately state their case in the absence of counsel, that any presumption to that effect should exist, or that the representation of parents by counsel is always essential to a fair trial. With respect to the appellant's case in particular, Athey J. held that there had been no suggestion that the appellant lacked the capacity to understand the allegations made by the Minister or to communicate her position to the Court. She found that provision of counsel to represent the appellant was not essential to a fair trial. Therefore, she concluded that the appellant's liberty interest would not be violated by the lack of state-funded legal representation.

B. Court of Appeal (1997), 187 N.B.R. (2d) 81 (N.B. C.A.)

(1) Hoyt C.J.N.B., Ayles and Turnbull JJ.A. for the majority

29 The majority of the Court of Appeal began by noting that the case was moot because the custody application had been determined. Nevertheless, following Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342 (S.C.C.) , they exercised their discretion to hear the case, given the importance of the issue.

30 The majority found that there could be no s. 7 violation in this case if the appellant were unrepresented at the custody hearing because parental liberty does not fall within the ambit of s. 7 of the Charter . In reaching this conclusion, the majority relied on my reasons in B. (R.) where I held at para. 22 that "s. 7 was not designed to protect even fundamental individual freedoms if those freedoms have no connection with the physical dimension of the concept of 'liberty'". Acknowledging the differing views in the Supreme Court in that case over the extent of the liberty interest protected by s. 7, they noted that only four members of the Court found a parental liberty interest, and that my reasons should be followed, at least until a majority of this Court rules to the contrary.

31 The majority also noted that the Family Services Act does not prohibit parents from retaining and instructing legal counsel. Parents are entitled to (1) be present at and participate in the hearing, with or without counsel, (2) hear all the evidence and cross-examine witnesses and, (3), present evidence and make other representations to the court. The majority found that the provisions of the Act, if complied with, ensure reasonable compliance with constitutional standards.

32 Finally, the majority held that the court would be exercising a legislative function if it allowed the appeal because it would be involving the courts in the task of both defining the scope of legal aid and administering it on an ad hoc basis. They found that the courts have heretofore refused to recognize an entitlement to state-funded counsel, citing in particular this Court's decision in R. v. Prosper, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 236 (S.C.C.) .

33 The majority concurred with Bastarache J.A.'s (as he then was) reasons for finding that there was no s. 15 violation in this case.

(2) Bastarache J.A. in dissent (Ryan J.A. concurring)

34 Bastarache J.A. rejected the appellant's s. 15 argument. He held that it was clear that the distinction drawn between indigent persons facing custody applications and indigent persons facing guardianship applications was not based on any particular personal characteristics. Consequently, no discrimination contrary to s. 15 had been established.

35 With respect to s. 7, Bastarache J.A. noted that there was no clear majority opinion of the Supreme Court as to whether the right to liberty in s. 7 includes parental rights. Nevertheless, he agreed with La Forest J.'s reasons in B. (R.) that the historical and social context applicable to constitutional interpretation reinforces the recognition of a parental liberty interest.

36 In reviewing the case law on the requirements of fundamental justice, Bastarache J.A. found that the right to funded counsel had not been considered outside the larger question of the right to a fair trial in the criminal law context. After considering a number of cases, including R. v. Rowbotham (1988), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.) , he concluded that s. 7 does not guarantee a general right to funded counsel, but requires the provision of paid counsel in order to guarantee a fair trial in serious and complex cases where the accused is impecunious and has been refused assistance by Legal Aid.

37 Outside the area of criminal law, Bastarache J.A. considered Howard v. Stony Mountain Institution, Presiding Officer of Inmate Disciplinary Court, [1984] 2 F.C. 642 (Fed. C.A.) , a parole board case, which he relied upon for the proposition that the matter of providing counsel is not discretionary, but a matter of right where the circumstances are such that a fair trial cannot be held without legal representation. He then considered Children's Aid Society of Ottawa-Carleton v. T. (M.) (December 8, 1995), Doc. Ottawa 21446/93 (Ont. Gen. Div.) , a child custody case, in which Desmarais J. applied Howard and concluded that an absence of counsel had rendered the trial ineffectual because a parent had difficulty presenting her case, did not understand the rules of evidence and had offered self-incriminating evidence.

38 In light of his review of the case law, Bastarache J.A. concluded that "the trial judge erred in finding that Ms. G could assume her own defence in the given proceedings without sacrificing her right to a fair trial" (p. 139). In reaching this conclusion, he noted that the proceedings were adversarial in nature, that the appellant's conduct was being examined and the findings of the court would create a stigma similar to that of a finding of guilt in some criminal prosecutions. The appellant was destitute, receiving welfare, and "not seen to be very rational" (p. 139). All other parties were represented by counsel. The proceedings were long and complex, and the matter was very emotional. Moreover, it was important that the appellant's views and explanations be well understood by the court in order to determine the best interests of the children.

39 Bastarache J.A. held that the failure to provide the appellant with legal aid could not be saved by s. 1. He would have allowed the appeal and awarded the appellant her fees and disbursements, determined by the Registrar of the court according to the Legal Aid Tariff, and payable by the Minister of Justice.

IV - Issues

40 On April 9, 1998 the following constitutional questions were stated:

> Question 1: In the circumstances of this case, did the failure of the Legal Aid Act , R.S.N.B. 1973, c. L-2, or the government of New Brunswick under its Domestic Legal Aid Program, to provide legal aid to respondents in custody applications by the Minister of Health and Community Services under Part IV of the Family Services Act , S.N.B. 1980, c. F-2.2, constitute an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ?
> Question 2: If the answer to question 1 is yes, is the infringement demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ?

V - Analysis

A. Mootness

41 As a preliminary matter, I will address the issue of mootness. A moot case is one in which a decision of the court "will not have the effect of resolving some controversy which affects or may affect the rights of the parties": see Borowski , supra , at p. 353. As a general rule, the Court will not decide moot cases. However, the Court may exercise its discretion to decide a moot case in certain circumstances. In Borowski , Sopinka J. set out the following test at p. 353:

> The approach in recent cases involves a two-step analysis. First it is necessary to determine whether the required tangible and concrete dispute has disappeared and the issues have become academic. Second, if the response to the first question is affirmative, it is necessary to decide if the court should exercise its discretion to hear the case.

42 There can be little doubt that the present appeal is moot, and that the response to the first question is affirmative. At issue is whether the government of New Brunswick was under an obligation to provide state-funded counsel to the appellant in the circumstances of this case. The appellant, though, was in fact represented by counsel at the custody hearing, the custody order has expired, and she has since regained custody of her children. Consequently, there is no "live controversy" in this appeal. T he tangible and concrete dispute has disappeared, and the issue has become academic.

43 Nevertheless, the Court has decided to exercise its discretion to decide this case. In Borowski , Sopinka J. identified three criteria relevant to the Court's exercise of discretion: the presence of an adversarial context, the concern for judicial economy, and the need for the Court to be sensitive to its role as the adjudicative branch in our political framework.

44 Applying these criteria to this appeal, I am satisfied that there was an appropriate adversarial context. The appeal was vigorously and fully argued on both sides by the parties and the interveners.

45 Turning to the second factor, this Court has held on a number of occasions that an expenditure of judicial resources is warranted in cases which raise important issues but are evasive of review: see Borowski , supra , at p. 360; Winnipeg Builders' Exchange v. I.B.E.W., Local 2085, [1967] S.C.R. 628 (S.C.C.) ; Québec (Procureur général) v. Canada (Procureur général), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 793 (S.C.C.) at p. 806.

46 The present appeal is a case in point. The question of whether a parent has a right to state-funded counsel at a custody hearing is undoubtedly of national importance. Similar cases may arise in the future, and the Court has an opportunity to clarify the law and provide guidance to the courts below. This is a particularly important factor, as evidenced by the facts of this case. Although the appellant's motion to be provided with state-funded counsel was brought well over a month before the custody hearing, Athey J. did not have the opportunity to determine the issue prior to the date set for the application, given the difficult constitutional questions raised and the need to quickly decide the custody hearing concerning the best interests of the children. A pre-hearing resolution of this issue is essential, for if no determination can be made prior to the hearing, the moving party is no better off than he or she would have been had the motion not been brought to begin with -he or she will almost invariably have to proceed without the assistance of counsel.

47 While similar cases may arise in the future, they are by nature evasive of review. This is so for two reasons. First, the custody order will ordinarily have expired by the time the matter comes to this Court, rendering the controversy moot. The Court will therefore likely have to decide a moot case if it ever wants to address this issue. An analogy can be drawn to the situation in I.B.E.W., Local 2085 , supra , where the issue was the validity of an interlocutory injunction prohibiting certain strike action. By the time the case reached this Court, the strike had been settled. Second, it is unlikely that appellants will be able to retain counsel for an appeal if they were unable to retain counsel at the initial hearing. As a result, few cases will ever be appealed to this Court, since the assistance of counsel is almost invariably required in negotiating the appeal process.

48 Finally, the Court is not overstepping its institutional role in deciding this case. Unlike Borowski , the appellant is not requesting a legal opinion on the interpretation of the Charter in the absence of legislation or other governmental action which would otherwise bring the Charter into play. While the issue in this case is moot, it is not abstract: see Borowski , supra , at p. 365.

49 In light of my conclusion that the Court should address the legal issues that arise in this case notwithstanding its mootness, I will proceed with my analysis on the assumption that the custody hearing had not yet taken place and that the appellant would not have been represented by counsel at the hearing. This is the same approach taken by both the motions judge and the Court of Appeal. I am proceeding in this fashion in order to review the lower court decisions and to determine whether the appellant had a right to state-funded counsel in the circumstances of this case.

50 In her motion, the appellant sought relief for a prospective s. 7 violation. She argued that the custody hearing would have been unfair were she not represented by counsel, infringing s. 7. She therefore requested that the court order the government to provide her with state-funded counsel pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter .

51 This Court has held on a number of occasions that remedies can be ordered in anticipation of future Charter violations, notwithstanding the retrospective language of s. 24(1): Operation Dismantle Inc. v. R., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441 (S.C.C.) ; R. v. Vermette, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 985 (S.C.C.) ; R. v. Harrer, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 562 (S.C.C.) . In Harrer , McLachlin J., concurring in the result, held at para. 42 that "[s]ection 24(1) applies to prospective breaches, although its wording refers to 'infringe' and 'deny' in the past tense". In Operation Dismantle , Dickson J. (as he then was) held at p. 450 that an applicant requesting a remedy for a prospective breach "must at least be able to establish a threat of violation, if not an actual violation, of their rights under the Charter ". He also found at p. 458 that courts require proof of "probable future harm" before ordering such a remedy.

52 In disposing of this appeal, the Court must determine whether s. 7 would likely have been infringed had the custody hearing proceeded with the appellant unrepresented and, if so, what the appropriate remedy should have been. Given the approach I will be taking, the constitutional questions must be slightly modified. As they are currently stated, the constitutional questions are retrospective rather than prospective in nature. The first question asks whether, in the circumstances of this case, the failure to provide the appellant with legal aid constituted an infringement of s. 7. Assuming the answer to the first question is yes, the second question asks if the infringement can be saved by s. 1.

53 Since the appellant is arguing that s. 7 would have been violated, not that it had been violated, the constitutional questions should be reformulated as follows:

> Question 1: In the circumstances of this case, would the failure of the Legal Aid Act , R.S.N.B. 1973, c. L-2, or the government of New Brunswick under its Domestic Legal Aid Program, to provide legal aid to respondents in custody applications by the Minister of Health and Community Services under Part IV of the*Family Services Act* , S.N.B. 1980, c. F-2.2, have constituted an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms if the appellant had not been represented by counsel at the custody hearing?

Question 2: If the answer to question 1 is yes, would the infringement have been demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ?

54 This Court has recently held in Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian & Northern Affairs) (1999), 239 N.R. 1 (S.C.C.) at para. 50, that constitutional questions can be restated provided that there is no "substantive prejudice ... caused to attorneys general or anyone else by the wording of the question, or that they would reasonably have made a different decision about exercising their right to intervene". In my opinion, none of the parties are prejudiced by the reformulation of the question, nor would any potential interveners have made a different decision about exercising their right to intervene. As I have already mentioned, both the motions judge and the Court of Appeal approached this case as though a prospective breach of s. 7 was at issue. Consequently, the parties' written and oral arguments in this appeal are equally applicable to the restated constitutional questions as they are to the original questions.

55 Having explained the approach I will be taking in this appeal, I will state my conclusions at the outset. The Minister's application to extend the original custody order pursuant to Part IV of the Family Services Act threatened to restrict the appellant's right to security of the person. This restriction would not have been in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice were the appellant unrepresented by counsel at the custody hearing. Section 7 guarantees every parent the right to a fair hearing when the state seeks to obtain custody of their children. In certain circumstances, which obtain in this case, the parent's right to a fair hearing requires the government to provide the parent with state-funded counsel. To avoid a prospective breach of s. 7, the motions judge, who was under a duty to ensure the fairness of the hearing, should have ordered the government to provide the appellant with state-funded counsel under s. 24(1). I will not be addressing s. 15 of the Charter , as it was not argued by either the appellant or the respondents in this Court.

B. Security of the Person

56 The appellant argued that the Minister of Health and Community Services' application to extend the order granting the Minister custody of her three children threatened to deprive her of both her s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person. I believe it is possible to dispose of this appeal by focussing on the appellant's right to security of the person. Since the appeal can be disposed of on this basis and there have been differing views expressed about the scope of the right to liberty in the Court's previous judgments, I will not address the issue of whether the appellant's right to liberty was also engaged in this case.

57 Were the Minister successful in his application, the appellant would have been separated from her children for up to an additional six months. There would also be no guarantee that she would regain custody of her children at the expiry of the order. The separation of parent and child contemplated by the Minister's application would unquestionably have profound effects on both parent and child. For the purposes of this appeal, however, what must be determined is whether relieving a parent of custody of his or her child restricts a parent's right to security of the person.

58 This Court has held on a number of occasions that the right to security of the person protects "both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual": see R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (S.C.C.) at p. 173 (per Wilson J.); Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123 (S.C.C.) at p. 1177; Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.) at pp. 587-88. Although these cases considered the right to security of the person in a criminal law context, I believe that the protection accorded by this right extends beyond the criminal law and can be engaged in child protection proceedings. Before addressing this issue, I will first make some general comments about the nature of the protection of "psychological integrity" included in the right to security of the person.

59 Delineating the boundaries protecting the individual's psychological integrity from state interference is an inexact science. Dickson C.J. in Morgentaler , supra , at p. 56 suggested that security of the person would be restricted through "serious state-imposed psychological stress" (emphasis added). Dickson C.J. was trying to convey something qualitative about the type of state interference that would rise to the level of an infringement of this right. It is clear that the right to security of the person does not protect the individual from the ordinary stresses and anxieties that a person of reasonable sensibility would suffer as a result of government action. If the right were interpreted with such broad sweep, countless government initiatives could be challenged on the ground that they infringe the right to security of the person, massively expanding the scope of judicial review, and, in the process, trivializing what it means for a right to be constitutionally protected. N or will every violation of a fundamental freedom guaranteed in s. 2 of the Charter amount to a restriction of security of the person. I do not believe it can be seriously argued that a law prohibiting certain kinds of commercial expression in violation of s. 2(b), for example, will necessarily result in a violation of the psychological integrity of the person. This is not to say, though, that there will never be cases where a violation of s. 2 will also deprive an individual of security of the person.

60 For a restriction of security of the person to be made out, then, the impugned state action must have a serious and profound effect on a person's psychological integrity. The effects of the state interference must be assessed objectively, with a view to their impact on the psychological integrity of a person of reasonable sensibility. This need not rise to the level of nervous shock or psychiatric illness, but must be greater than ordinary stress or anxiety.

61 I have little doubt that state removal of a child from parental custody pursuant to the state's parens patriae jurisdiction constitutes a serious interference with the psychological integrity of the parent. The parental interest in raising and caring for a child is, as La Forest J. held in B. (R.) , supra , at para. 83, "an individual interest of fundamental importance in our society". Besides the obvious distress arising from the loss of companionship of the child, direct state interference with the parent-child relationship, through a procedure in which the relationship is subject to state inspection and review, is a gross intrusion into a private and intimate sphere. Further, the parent is often stigmatized as "unfit" when relieved of custody. As an individual's status as a parent is often fundamental to personal identity, the stigma and distress resulting from a loss of parental status is a particularly serious consequence of the state's conduct.

62 In R. v. Mills, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863 (S.C.C.) at pp. 919-20, a case dealing with the s. 11(b) right to be tried within a reasonable time, I found that the combination of stigmatization, loss of privacy, and disruption of family life were sufficient to constitute a restriction of security of the person:

> ... security of the person is not restricted to physical integrity; rather, it encompasses protection against "overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation"... These include stigmatization of the accused, loss of privacy, stress and anxiety resulting from a multitude of factors, including possible disruption of family, social life and work, legal costs, uncertainty as to the outcome and sanction.

As I have noted, these are precisely the same consequences arising from the state's conduct in this case.

63 Not every state action which interferes with the parent-child relationship will restrict a parent's right to security of the person. For example, a parent's security of the person is not restricted when, without more, his or her child is sentenced to jail or conscripted into the army. Nor is it restricted when the child is negligently shot and killed by a police officer: see Augustus v. Gosset, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 268 (S.C.C.) .

64 While the parent may suffer significant stress and anxiety as a result of the interference with the relationship occasioned by these actions, the quality of the "injury" to the parent is distinguishable from that in the present case. In the aforementioned examples, the state is making no pronouncement as to the parent's fitness or parental status, nor is it usurping the parental role or prying into the intimacies of the relationship. In short, the state is not directly interfering with the psychological integrity of the parent qua parent. The different effect on the psychological integrity of the parent in the above examples leads me to the conclusion that no constitutional rights of the parent are engaged.

65 I now turn to the question of whether the right to security of the person extends beyond the criminal law context. In both Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada) and B. (R.) , supra , I held that the restrictions on liberty and security of the person that s. 7 is concerned with are those that occur as a result of an individual's interaction with the justice system and its administration. In other words, the subject matter of s. 7 is the state's conduct in the course of enforcing and securing compliance with the law, where the state's conduct deprives an individual of his or her right to life, liberty, or security of the person. I hastened to add, however, that s. 7 is not limited solely to purely criminal or penal matters. There are other ways in which the government, in the course of the administration of justice, can deprive a person of their s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person, i.e., civil committal to a mental institution: see B. (R.) , supra , at para. 22.

66 A child custody application is an example of state action which directly engages the justice system and its administration. The Family Services Act provides that a judicial hearing must be held in order to determine whether a parent should be relieved of custody of his or her child.

67 I therefore conclude that the Minister of Health and Community Services' application to extend the original custody order threatened to restrict the appellant's right to security of the person. I note that this conclusion is not inconsistent with the position I adopted in B. (R.) , where I limited my comments to the issue of the scope of the right to liberty under s. 7 and in particular, whether the right to liberty includes the right of parents to choose medical treatment for their child.

C. Principles of Fundamental Justice

68 I now turn to consider whether the potential restriction of the appellant's right to security of the person would have been in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice were she not represented by counsel at the custody hearing.

69 While relieving a parent of custody of his or her child restricts the parent's right to security of the person, this restriction may nevertheless be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The principles of fundamental justice "are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system": Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.) at p. 503. It is a time-honoured principle that the state may relieve a parent of custody when necessary to protect a child's health and safety. Rand J.'s judgment in Hepton v. Maat, [1957] S.C.R. 606 (S.C.C.) , is the classic statement of this principle in Canadian law. At pp. 607-8, he wrote:

> It is, I think, of the utmost importance that questions involving the custody of infants be approached with a clear view of the governing considerations. That view cannot be less than this: prima facie the natural parents are entitled to custody unless by reason of some act, condition or circumstance affecting them it is evident that the welfare of the child requires that fundamental natural relation be severed. ...
>
> The view of the child's welfare conceives it to lie, first, within the warmth and security of the home provided by his parents; when through a failure, with or without parental fault, to furnish that protection, that welfare is threatened, the community, represented by the Sovereign, is, on the broadest social and national grounds, justified in displacing the parents and assuming their duties.
>
> This, in substance, is the rule of law established for centuries and in the light of which the common law Courts and the Court of Chancery, following their differing rules, dealt with custody.

70 More recently, La Forest J., writing for three others in B. (R.) held at para. 88 that > the common law has long recognized the power of the state to intervene to protect children whose lives are in jeopardy and to promote their well-being, basing such intervention on its parens patriae jurisdiction; see for example Hepton v. Maat , supra ; E. (Mrs.) v. Eve, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 388 . The protection of a child's right to life and to health, when it becomes necessary to do so, is a basic tenet of our legal system, and legislation to that end accords with the principles of fundamental justice, so long, of course, as it also meets the requirements of fair procedure.

Thus, the principles of fundamental justice in child protection proceedings are both substantive and procedural. The state may only relieve a parent of custody when it is necessary to protect the best interests of the child, provided that there is a fair procedure for making this determination.

71 The appellant did not contest the legitimacy of the principle that the state may relieve a parent of custody to protect the child's health and safety. Rather, she took issue with the fairness of the procedure in this case.

72 A fair procedure for determining whether a custody order should be extended requires a fair hearing before a neutral and impartial arbiter. The paramount consideration at the hearing should be the child's best interests. This is recognized in s. 53(2) of the Family Services Act , which provides:

> When disposing of an application under this Part the court shall at all times place above all other considerations the best interests of the child.

73 For the hearing to be fair, the parent must have an opportunity to present his or her case effectively. Effective parental participation at the hearing is essential for determining the best interests of the child in circumstances where the parent seeks to maintain custody of the child. The best interests of the child are presumed to lie within the parental home. However, when the state makes an application for custody, it does so because there are grounds to believe that is not the case. A judge must then determine whether the parent should retain custody. In order to make this determination, the judge must be presented with evidence of the child's home life and the quality of parenting it has been receiving and is expected to receive. The parent is in a unique position to provide this information to the court. If denied the opportunity to participate effectively at the hearing, the judge may be unable to make an accurate determination of the child's best interests. There is a risk that the parent will lose custody of the child when in actual fact it might have been in the child's best interests to remain in his or her care.

74 The Family Services Act allows parents to be present at and participate in the hearing, with or without counsel, hear all the evidence and cross-examine witnesses, and present evidence and make other representations to the court. However, it does not provide for the payment of legal fees incurred by parents with respect to an application by the Minister. Indigent parents must resort to the legal aid scheme, if there is one, as is the case in New Brunswick. If no legal aid is available, as in this case, the parent is forced to participate in the proceedings without the benefit of counsel. The majority of the Court of Appeal nevertheless held that the procedural rights provided by the Family Services Act , if complied with, would have been sufficient to "ensure reasonable compliance with constitutional standards".

75 I respectfully disagree. In the circumstances of this case , the appellant's right to a fair hearing required that she be represented by counsel. I have reached this conclusion through a consideration of the following factors: the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the appellant. I will consider each in turn.

76 The interests at stake in the custody hearing are unquestionably of the highest order. Few state actions can have a more profound effect on the lives of both parent and child. Not only is the parent's right to security of the person at stake, the child's is as well. Since the best interests of the child are presumed to lie with the parent, the child's psychological integrity and well-being may be seriously affected by the interference with the parent-child relationship.

77 Of particular importance is the fact that the state was seeking to extend a previous custody order by six months. A six-month separation of a parent from three young children is a significant period of time. It is even more significant when considered in light of the fact that the appellant had already been separated from her children for over a year and that generally speaking, the longer the separation of parent from child, the less likely it is that the parent will ever regain custody.

78 There is some debate between the parties as to whether child custody proceedings under the Family Services Act are more properly classified as adversarial or administrative in nature. In my view, a formalistic classification of the nature of the proceedings is not helpful in resolving the issue at hand. Child protection proceedings do not admit of easy classification. As Professor Thompson argues, the "unique amalgam of elements — criminal, civil, family, administrative — makes child protection proceedings so hard to characterize": D. A. Rollie Thompson, "Taking Children and Facts Seriously: Evidence Law in Child Protection Proceedings - Part I" (1988), 7 Can. J. Fam. L. 11, at p. 12.

79 At issue in this appeal is whether the custody hearing would have been sufficiently complex, in light of the other two factors, that the assistance of a lawyer would have been necessary to ensure the appellant her right to a fair hearing. I believe that it would have been. Although perhaps more administrative in nature than criminal proceedings, child custody proceedings are effectively adversarial proceedings which occur in a court of law. The parties are responsible for planning and presenting their cases. While the rules of evidence are somewhat relaxed, difficult evidentiary issues are frequently raised. The parent must adduce evidence, cross-examine witnesses, make objections and present legal defences in the context of what is to many a foreign environment, and under significant emotional strain. In this case, all other parties were represented by counsel. The hearing was scheduled to last three days, and counsel for the Minister planned to present 15 affidavits, including two expert reports.

80 In proceedings as serious and complex as these, an unrepresented parent will ordinarily need to possess superior intelligence or education, communication skills, composure, and familiarity with the legal system in order to effectively present his or her case. There is no evidence in Athey J.'s decision or the record to suggest that the appellant possessed such capacities.

81 In light of these factors, I find that the appellant needed to be represented by counsel for there to have been a fair determination of the children's best interests. Without the benefit of counsel, the appellant would not have been able to participate effectively at the hearing, creating an unacceptable risk of error in determining the children's best interests and thereby threatening to violate both the appellant's and her children's s. 7 right to security of the person. I say this despite the motions judge's finding to the contrary.

82 Athey J., in concluding that representation of the appellant by counsel was not essential to a fair hearing, said at p. 205:

> There has been no suggestion that J. G. lacks the capacity to understand the allegations made by the Minister or that she is unable to communicate her position to the court. In these circumstances I am not convinced that she is not able to adequately state her case or that provision of counsel to represent her is essential to a fair trial.

When a trial judge decides that an indigent parent does not need legal representation for there to be a fair custody hearing, the judge's finding should ordinarily be accorded deference by a reviewing court if the reviewing court becomes seized of the matter prior to the commencement of the hearing pursuant to an interlocutory appeal. This is because whether counsel for the parent is necessary to ensure the fairness of the hearing depends on a consideration of the factors I outlined above, and a trial judge is generally better positioned than a reviewing court to make this determination. He or she is better situated to make an accurate assessment of the complexity of the proceedings and, in particular, the parent's capacities. Moreover, the trial judge is under a duty to ensure a fair hearing, and has the ability to assist the parent in the proceedings, within the limits of his or her judicial role. Even if the parent is in need of some assistance, the judge may feel that he or she can intervene sufficiently to ensure the fairness of the hearing. Therefore, an appellate court should be wary of overturning a trial judge's decision, assuming that the appropriate factors are considered.

83 In the unusual circumstances of this case , however, I find that little deference should be accorded to the motions judge's conclusion that the appellant was capable of adequately representing herself. First, Athey J., who did not have the benefit of these reasons, referred to the appellant's "capacity to understand the allegations" and ability to "communicate her position to the court" (p. 205). This creates the impression that Athey J. may have assessed whether counsel was necessary for a fair hearing according to the same standard used to determine competence to stand trial on criminal charges. Competence is a necessary but not sufficient condition for determining whether an unrepresented parent will receive a fair custody hearing. Although competent, the parent must be able to participate meaningfully at the hearing, which goes beyond mere ability to understand the case and communicate.

84 Second, even assuming that Athey J. applied the correct test and considered the appropriate factors, she decided the motion on the appellant's right to counsel nearly a full year after the custody hearing. More importantly, the appellant was in fact represented by counsel at the hearing. Ordinarily a judge would determine whether representation by counsel is essential for a fair hearing prior to the commencement of the hearing. The fact that the motions judge made her determination after a hearing in which the appellant's case was presented through the assistance of counsel may have had an unduly influential effect on her conclusion. For example, the smoothness with which the proceeding was conducted may well have caused the motions judge to discount its complexity, as well as any limitations in the appellant's ability to communicate effectively in a court of law.

85 Therefore, attempting to put myself in the position of the motions judge prior to the hearing, when considering the seriousness and complexity of the proceedings and the capacities of the appellant, I disagree with her finding that the appellant could communicate effectively enough without the assistance of counsel to ensure a fair hearing. I believe this Court may justifiably overturn her decision.

86 I would like to make it clear that the right to a fair hearing will not always require an individual to be represented by counsel when a decision is made affecting that individual's right to life, liberty, or security of the person. In particular, a parent need not always be represented by counsel in order to ensure a fair custody hearing. The seriousness and complexity of a hearing and the capacities of the parent will vary from case to case. Whether it is necessary for the parent to be represented by counsel is directly proportional to the seriousness and complexity of the proceedings, and inversely proportional to the capacities of the parent.

87 Although all custody hearings engage serious interests, the seriousness of the interests at stake varies according to the length of the proposed separation of parent from child. For instance, permanent guardianship applications are more serious than temporary custody applications. Therefore, counsel will more likely be necessary in guardianship applications than custody applications. The difference in seriousness between these two types of applications is currently recognized by Legal Aid New Brunswick, which provides legal aid certificates to financially eligible applicants in all guardianship applications but not in all custody applications. There is also a difference in the seriousness of the interests at stake in custody hearings depending on the length of any previous separation.

88 The complexity of the hearing can vary dramatically from case to case. Some hearings may be very short, involve relatively simple questions of fact and credibility, and have no expert reports. Others might take days and involve complicated evidentiary questions, troublesome points of law, and multiple experts. In the former cases, the assistance of counsel will make little difference to the parent's ability to present his or her view of the child's best interests, whereas in the latter cases, the representation of counsel may be essential to ensure a fair hearing.

89 The parent's capacities are also variable. Some parents may be well educated, familiar with the legal system, and possess above-average communication skills and the composure to advocate effectively in an emotional setting. At the other extreme, some parents may have little education and difficulty communicating, particularly in a court of law. It is unfortunately the case that this is true of a disproportionate number of parents involved in child custody proceedings, who often are members of the least advantaged groups in society. The more serious and complex the proceedings, the more likely it will be that the parent will need to possess exceptional capacities for there to be a fair hearing if the parent is unrepresented.

90 Without commenting on their correctness, I note that there are a number of appellate court cases in Canada which have found that legal representation of an accused may be necessary to ensure a fair trial, pursuant to ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter . These cases are noteworthy because the criteria employed by the courts to determine whether counsel was warranted included the seriousness of the interests at stake and the complexity of the proceedings: see Rowbotham , supra ; R. v. Robinson (1989), 63 D.L.R. (4th) 289 (Alta. C.A.) ; R. v. Rain (1998), 130 C.C.C. (3d) 167 (Alta. C.A.) .

91 I therefore conclude that the potential restriction of the appellant's right to security of the person would not have been in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice had the custody hearing proceeded with the appellant unrepresented by counsel. The potential s. 7 violation in this case would have been the result of the failure of the government of New Brunswick to provide the appellant with state-funded counsel under its Domestic Legal Aid program after initiating proceedings under Part IV of the Family Services Act .

92 In attributing the failure to provide state-funded counsel to the government's administration of the Domestic Legal Aid program, I do not mean to suggest that the Domestic Legal Aid program as it stands is the only way the government could have fulfilled its constitutional obligation in this case. The government has wide latitude in discharging its constitutional duty to provide state-funded counsel in proceedings where that duty arises. It could have done so in any number of ways — under the Legal Aid Act , the Family Services Act , or a myriad of other legislation or programs. This Court need not and should not tell the government of New Brunswick what specific delivery system should have been employed.

93 Nevertheless, notwithstanding the variety of potential delivery options, the government chose to enact a general legal aid scheme with a scope of application encompassing the proceeding at issue in this appeal. It also adopted a specific policy of not providing legal aid to respondents in custody applications. Most importantly, the Attorney General and Ministers of Justice and Health and Community Services' s. 1 arguments seeking to justify the infringement (if one were to be found) of the appellant's s. 7 rights attribute it to the administration of the legal aid scheme. Therefore, it is not unreasonable to find the Domestic Legal Aid program to be the locus of the constitutional violation in this case.

D. Section 1

94 Although this case involves a prospective violation of s. 7, it is still necessary to engage in a s. 1 analysis. For if the prospective s. 7 violation would otherwise have been saved by s. 1, then there would be no need to order a remedy.

95 Section 1 of the Charter provides:

> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

In R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 (S.C.C.) , this Court set out the analytical framework for determining whether a law constitutes a reasonable limit on a Charter right. Iacobucci J. summarized this framework in Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513 (S.C.C.) at para. 605:

> A limitation to a constitutional guarantee will be sustained once two conditions are met. First, the objective of the legislation must be pressing and substantial. Second, the means chosen to attain this legislative end must be reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. In order to satisfy the second requirement, three criteria must be satisfied: (1) the rights violation must be rationally connected to the aim of the legislation; (2) the impugned provision must minimally impair the Charter guarantee; and (3) there must be proportionality between the effect of the measure and its objective so that the attainment of the legislative goal is not outweighed by the abridgement of the right.

96 The appellant quite rightly is not directly challenging the Legal Aid Act , but rather administrative decisions made pursuant to it. The Legal Aid Act does not expressly or by necessary implication deny state-funded counsel to respondents in custody applications. On the contrary, both Legal Aid New Brunswick, pursuant to s. 12 of the Act, and the Minister of Justice, pursuant to s. 24 may provide state-funded counsel in these circumstances.

97 Despite the fact that state-funded legal assistance could have been provided in cases of custody applications pursuant to ss. 12 and 24, it was not. The Minister of Justice's program did not cover either guardianship or custody applications initiated by the Minister of Health and Community Services. This decision was made in order to avoid any potential conflicts of interest for Family Solicitors, who would be forced to act against the government while being paid by the Minister of Justice. As a result, Legal Aid New Brunswick agreed to continue providing legal aid certificates in cases of guardianship applications, but expressly refused to do so for custody applications. This had been Legal Aid New Brunswick's policy prior to 1993, when the Minister of Justice's program was first introduced. In December of 1991, the Council of the Law Society adopted a policy of limiting the provision of legal aid certificates to victims of family violence involved in private family litigation and to respondents to guardianship applications by the Minister of Health and Community Services. This policy was adopted pursuant to s. 12(14) of the Act, which provides that the Law Society may limit the provision of legal aid in certain matters when the Legal Aid Fund is in danger of being depleted. Consequently, the Charter infringement in this case is not caused "by the legislation itself, but by the actions of a delegated decision-maker in applying it": see Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624 (S.C.C.) at para. 20. See also Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038 (S.C.C.) at p. 1078.

98 Assuming without deciding that the policy of not providing state-funded counsel to respondents in custody applications was a limit prescribed by law, that the objective of this policy — controlling legal aid expenditures — is pressing and substantial, that the policy is rationally connected to that objective, and that it constitutes a minimal impairment of s. 7, I find that the deleterious effects of the policy far outweigh the salutary effects of any potential budgetary savings.

99 Section 7 violations are not easily saved by s. 1. In Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), supra , at p. 518, I said:

Section 1 may, for reasons of administrative expediency, successfully come to the rescue of an otherwise violation of s. 7, but only in cases arising out of exceptional conditions, such as natural disasters, the outbreak of war, epidemics, and the like.

This is so for two reasons. First, the rights protected by s. 7 — life, liberty, and security of the person — are very significant and cannot ordinarily be overridden by competing social interests. Second, rarely will a violation of the principles of fundamental justice, specifically the right to a fair hearing, be upheld as a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

100 In the circumstances of this case, the government of New Brunswick argues that the objective of limiting legal aid expenditures is of sufficient importance to deny the appellant a fair hearing. The proposed budgetary savings, however, are minimal. In their factum, Legal Aid New Brunswick and the Law Society of New Brunswick report that the projected annual cost of their new policy, effective September 22, 1997, of issuing legal aid certificates to respondents in custody applications for their first hearing would be under $100,000. Although the present appeal concerns the right to state-funded counsel at a hearing to extend an original custody order, the additional cost of providing state-funded counsel in these circumstances is insufficient to constitute a justification within the meaning of s. 1. Moreover, the government is not under an obligation to provide legal aid to every parent who cannot afford a lawyer. Rather, the obligation only arises in circumstances where the representation of the parent is essential to ensure a fair hearing where the parent's life, liberty, or security is at stake. In my view, a parent's right to a fair hearing when the state seeks to suspend such parent's custody of his or her child outweighs the relatively modest sums, when considered in light of the government's entire budget, at issue in this appeal.

E. Remedy

101 There are only two possible remedies a judge can order under s. 24(1) to avoid a prospective s. 7 breach in circumstances where the absence of counsel for one of the parties would result in an unfair hearing: an order that the government provide the unrepresented party with state-funded counsel, or a stay of proceedings. A stay of proceedings is clearly inappropriate in this case, as it would result in the return of the children to the appellant's custody. Children should not be returned to their parent's care when there is reason to suspect that they are in need of protection. Indeed, this would run contrary to the purposes of Part IV of the Family Services Act . The government must, therefore, provide the appellant with state-funded counsel.

102 It is unnecessary, however, to direct the government of New Brunswick to rectify the policy's constitutional infirmities through the adoption of a new policy. Directing the government to design a new policy would run contrary to Sopinka J.'s admonition in Osborne v. Canada (Treasury Board)), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 69 (S.C.C.) at p. 104, to "refrain from intruding into the legislative sphere beyond what is necessary" in fashioning remedies for Charter violations. It is not clear how often the operation of the policy will lead to an unconstitutional hearing. It may be only in rare cases. Accordingly, the least intrusive remedy would be to leave the policy intact, subject to a discretion vested in the trial judge to order state-funded counsel on a case-by-case basis when necessary to ensure the fairness of the custody hearing. That having been said, there is nothing preventing the government from amending the policy - for example reading in a discretion - or providing respondents to custody applications with state-funded counsel through means other than the Domestic Legal Aid program.

103 As similar cases may arise in the future, I will briefly outline the procedure that should be followed when an unrepresented parent in a custody application seeks state-funded counsel. The judge at the hearing should first inquire as to whether the parent applied for legal aid or any other form of state-funded legal assistance offered by the province. If the parent has not exhausted all possible avenues for obtaining state-funded legal assistance, the proceedings should be adjourned to give the parent a reasonable time to make the appropriate applications, provided the best interests of the children are not compromised. It goes without saying that if the parent, whether or not he or she is able to pay for a lawyer, chooses not to have one that there will be no entitlement to state-funded legal assistance: see Rowbotham , supra , at p. 64. This is because the parent voluntarily assumes the risk of ineffective representation, for which the government cannot be held responsible.

104 If the parent wants a lawyer but is unable to afford one, the judge should next consider whether the parent can receive a fair hearing through a consideration of the following criteria: the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the parent. The judge should also bear in mind his or her ability to assist the parent within the limits of the judicial role. If, after considering these criteria, the judge is not satisfied that the parent can receive a fair hearing and there is no other way to provide the parent with a lawyer (i.e., pursuant to a statutory power to appoint counsel), the judge should order the government to provide the parent with state-funded counsel under s. 24(1) of the Charter . I hasten to add that I am limiting my comments here to child protection proceedings, and need not and should not comment as to other kinds of proceedings.

105 Having now decided that the government was under a constitutional obligation to provide state-funded counsel to the appellant to ensure the fairness of the custody hearing in this case, I turn to consider a passage from my judgment in Prosper , supra , which may appear to be in tension with this conclusion.

106 At issue in Prosper was whether s. 10(b) of the Charter imposed a substantive constitutional obligation on governments to ensure that duty counsel is available upon arrest or detention to provide free and immediate preliminary legal advice upon request. The Court was unanimous in concluding that it did not. In my reasons, I held at pp. 266-67 that:

> [T]here is evidence which shows that the framers of the Charter consciously chose not to constitutionalize a right to state-funded counsel under s. 10 of the Charter: Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada (January 27, 1981). Specifically, a proposed amendment, which would have added the following clause to what is now s. 10 of the Charter was considered and rejected (p. 46:127):
> > (d) if without sufficient means to pay for counsel and if the interests of justice so require, to be provided with counsel;
> ... In my opinion, it would be imprudent for this Court not to attribute any significance to the fact that this clause was not adopted. In light of the language of s. 10 of the Charter , which on its face does not guarantee any substantive right to legal advice, and the legislative history of s. 10, which reveals that the framers of the Charter decided not to incorporate into s. 10 even a relatively limited substantive right to legal assistance (i.e., for those "without sufficient means" and "if the interests of justice so require"), it would be a very big step for this Court to interpret the Charter in a manner which imposes a positive constitutional obligation on governments. The fact that such an obligation would almost certainly interfere with governments' allocation of limited resources by requiring them to expend public funds on the provision of a service is, I might add, a further consideration which weighs against this interpretation. [Emphasis in original.]

107 The omission of a positive right to state-funded counsel in s. 10, which, as I said in Prosper , should be accorded some significance, does not preclude an interpretation of s. 7 that imposes a positive constitutional obligation on governments to provide counsel in those cases when it is necessary to ensure a fair hearing. To hold otherwise would be to suggest that the principles of fundamental justice do not guarantee the right to a fair hearing or, alternatively, that under no circumstances would the requirements of a fair hearing obligate governments to pay for an individual to be represented by counsel. Both of these positions are untenable. In my view, the significance of the omission of a positive right to state-funded counsel under s. 10 is that s. 7 should not be interpreted as providing an absolute right to state-funded counsel at all hearings where an individual's life, liberty, and security is at stake and the individual cannot afford a lawyer. Accordingly, while a blanket right to state-funded counsel does not exist under s. 10, a limited right to state-funded counsel arises under s. 7 to ensure a fair hearing in the circumstances I have outlined above.

108 With respect to the concern in Prosper that a positive constitutional obligation to provide state-funded counsel would interfere with governments' allocation of limited resources, I note that these fiscal concerns have been addressed under s. 1.

VI. Disposition

109 The appeal is allowed. The government of New Brunswick shall pay the appellant her solicitor-client costs, both in this Court and in the courts below, to be determined by the Registrar according to the Legal Aid Tariff in New Brunswick or the tariff applicable to non-governmental lawyers hired by the government of New Brunswick to handle certain matters in the manner of these proceedings.

110 I would answer the restated constitutional questions as follows:

> Question 1: In the circumstances of this case, would the failure of the Legal Aid Act , R.S.N.B. 1973, c. L-2, or the government of New Brunswick under its Domestic Legal Aid Program, to provide legal aid to respondents in custody applications by the Minister of Health and Community Services under Part IV of the Family Services Act , S.N.B. 1980, c. F-2.2, have constituted an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms if the appellant had not been represented by counsel at the custody hearing?
> Answer: Yes, in the circumstances of this case.
>
> Question 2: If the answer to question 1 is yes, would the infringement have been demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ?
>
> Answer: No.

L'Heureux-Dubé J.* (concurring):

111 The appellant is the mother of three children. At the time of the hearing that is the subject of this appeal, the Minister of Health and Community Services had been granted custody of the children for six months, and was seeking to extend the custody order for a further six months. The legal aid programmes in place in the province of New Brunswick at the time did not provide funding for temporary custody applications or extensions of existing orders, but only for permanent guardianship applications. Ms. G. was therefore not able to receive funded counsel at the hearing where the Minister sought the extension of the custody order, and was unable to afford to hire her own counsel. The hearing took place over three days, and the Minister, along with all other interested parties, was represented by counsel. Fifteen witnesses were called, including expert witnesses, and several expert reports were presented. Although Ms. G. received the voluntary assistance of counsel, this appeal requires the Court to decide whether the appellant's rights under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were engaged, and, if so, whether the procedures adopted would have complied with the principles of fundamental justice had she not received counsel. I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and I agree with him that this child protection hearing implicated the appellant's right to security of the person, and that in this case the procedure that threatened to deprive her of that right would not have been in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice because of the lack of funded counsel. However, I wish to set out my own views on the constitutional rights implicated and the appropriate test for determining when the failure to accord counsel to a parent would result in a procedure that is not in accordance with fundamental justice.

I. The Charter Rights Implicated

A. Equality

112 Before turning to the analysis of the s. 7 rights implicated and the principles of fundamental justice, I would emphasize that this case also implicates issues of equality, guaranteed by s. 15 of the Charter . These equality interests should be considered in interpreting the scope and content of the interpretation of the rights guaranteed by s. 7. This Court has recognized the important influence of the equality guarantee on the other rights in the Charter . As McIntyre J. wrote in Andrews v. Law Society (British Columbia), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143 (S.C.C.) at p. 185:

> The section 15(1) guarantee is the broadest of all guarantees. It applies to and supports all other rights guaranteed by the Charter .

All Charter rights strengthen and support each other (see, for example, R. v. L. (T.P.), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309 (S.C.C.) at p. 326; R. v. Tran, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 951 (S.C.C.) at p. 976) and s. 15 plays a particularly important role in that process. The interpretive lens of the equality guarantee should therefore influence the interpretation of other constitutional rights where applicable, and in my opinion, principles of equality, guaranteed by both s. 15 and s. 28, are a significant influence on interpreting the scope of protection offered by s. 7.

113 This case raises issues of gender equality because women, and especially single mothers, are disproportionately and particularly affected by child protection proceedings: see, for example, M. Callahan, "Feminist Approaches: Women Recreate Child Welfare", in B. Wharf, ed., Rethinking Child Welfare in Canada (1992), 172. The fact that this appeal relates to legal representation in the family context for those whose economic circumstances are such that they are unable to afford such representation is significant. As I wrote in Moge v. Moge, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 813 (S.C.C.) at p. 853, "In Canada, the feminization of poverty is an entrenched social phenomenon." The patterns of relationships within marriage disproportionately lead to women taking responsibility for child care, foregoing economic opportunities in the workforce, and suffering economic deprivation as a result: Moge , supra , at p. 861. Issues involving parents who are poor necessarily disproportionately affect women and therefore raise equality concerns and the need to consider women's perspectives.

114 As well as affecting women in particular, issues of fairness in child protection hearings also have particular importance for the interests of women and men who are members of other disadvantaged and vulnerable groups, particularly visible minorities, Aboriginal people, and the disabled. As noted by the United States Supreme Court in Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745 (U.S. N.Y., 1982) at p. 763:

> Because parents subject to termination proceedings are often poor, uneducated, or members of minority groups ... such proceedings are often vulnerable to judgments based on cultural or class bias.

Similarly, Professors Cossman and Rogerson note that "The parents in child protection cases are typically the most disadvantaged and vulnerable within the family law system...": "Case Study in the Provision of Legal Aid: Family Law", in Report of the Ontario Legal Aid Review: A Blueprint of Publicly Funded Legal Services (1997), 773, at p. 787.

115 Thus, in considering the s. 7 rights at issue, and the principles of fundamental justice that apply in this situation, it is important to ensure that the analysis takes into account the principles and purposes of the equality guarantee in promoting the equal benefit of the law and ensuring that the law responds to the needs of those disadvantaged individuals and groups whose protection is at the heart of s. 15. The rights in s. 7 must be interpreted through the lens of ss. 15 and 28, to recognize the importance of ensuring that our interpretation of the Constitution responds to the realities and needs of all members of society.

B. Security of the Person

116 Turning to the s. 7 rights engaged, I agree with the Chief Justice, for the reasons that he states, that the appellant's security of the person was implicated when the government instituted proceedings to extend the existing custody order. As he discusses, the importance of one's identity as a parent, and the serious stigma and psychological stress that will occur if the child is removed from the home because of the removal of the parent's power to care for him or her mean that the parent's security of the person will be violated if the child is removed from the home.

C. Liberty

117 I also agree with Bastarache J.A. (as he then was), who dissented in the Court of Appeal, that the right to liberty within s. 7 is triggered. In B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto (1994), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315 (S.C.C.) , La Forest J., writing on behalf of four members of the Court, held that the liberty interest must be interpreted broadly, in accordance with the principles and values of the Charter as a whole. He wrote, at para. 80:

> On the one hand, liberty does not mean unconstrained freedom. ... Freedom of the individual to do what he or she wishes must, in any organized society, be subjected to numerous constraints for the common good. The state undoubtedly has the right to impose many types of restraints on individual behaviour, and not all limitations will attract Charter scrutiny. On the other hand, liberty does not mean mere freedom from physical restraint. In a free and democratic society, the individual must be left room for personal autonomy to live his or her own life and to make decisions that are of fundamental personal importance . [Emphasis added.]

Similar principles were articulated in R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (S.C.C.) at p. 166, per Wilson J.; and Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844 (S.C.C.) at para. 66, per La Forest J. I continue to agree with these statements, and I note that they were not rejected by a majority of the Court in either of the above cases.

118 Applying these principles to the context of the family in B.(R.) , La Forest J. held that parental decision-making and other attributes of custody are protected under the liberty interest. He wrote, at paras. 83 and 85:

> ... I would have thought it plain that the right to nurture a child, to care for its development, and to make decisions for it in fundamental matters such as medical care, are part of the liberty interest of a parent.
> [The parental] role translates into a protected sphere of parental decision-making which is rooted in the presumption that parents should make important decisions affecting their children both because parents are more likely to appreciate the best interests of their children and because the state is ill-equipped to make such decisions itself. Moreover, individuals have a deep personal interest as parents in fostering the growth of their own children. This is not to say that the state cannot intervene when it considers it necessary to safeguard the child's autonomy or health. But such intervention must be justified. In other words, parental decision-making must receive the protection of the Charter in order for state interference to be properly monitored by the courts, and be permitted only when it conforms to the values underlying the Charter . [Emphasis added.]

Wardship proceedings, in my view, implicate these fundamental liberty interests of parents. The result of the proceeding may be that the parent is deprived of the right to make decisions on behalf of children and guide their upbringing, which is protected by s. 7. Though the state may intervene when necessary, liberty interests are engaged of which the parent can only be deprived in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Interpreting the interests here as protected under s. 7 also reflects the equality values set out above.

II. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

119 I agree with the Chief Justice, for the reasons he sets out, that the principles of fundamental justice require that a parent be able to participate in the hearing adequately and effectively, and that it is the obligation of the trial judge to exercise his or her discretion in determining when a lack of counsel will interfere with the ability of the parent to present his or her case. I also agree with him that this discretion was not properly exercised here. The trial judge was in error in not adequately considering the values of meaningful participation in the hearing affecting the rights of the child or the complexity of this case and the difficulty the appellant would face in presenting her case.

120 As to the criteria for determining when the provision of counsel will be necessary to ensure a fair hearing if the parent cannot otherwise afford a lawyer, first, I agree with the Chief Justice that a trial judge, in determining whether a parent will be able to participate effectively in the hearing, must consider the seriousness of the interests, the complexity of the proceedings, and the characteristics of the parent affected. I would view these interests broadly, and would therefore find that the right to funded counsel in child protection hearings, when a parent cannot afford a lawyer and the parent is not covered by the legal aid scheme, will not infrequently be invoked.

121 On the issue of the seriousness of the interests at stake, I agree with my colleague that child protection hearings will have varying degrees of seriousness. Under the legislation of different provinces, varying types of orders may be made, including orders that the child be placed with the parent subject to supervision, or temporary or permanent orders depriving the parent of custody. The seriousness of the order requested will play a role in the balancing of interests that takes place when determining whether counsel is necessary to ensure effective participation in the proceedings. However, in my view, whether the application is temporary or permanent should not have a significant effect on whether the parent will be granted a right to counsel. When considering this factor, trial judges should be attentive to the fact that temporary applications are often part of a process that leads to permanent ones, and it is necessary to consider the seriousness of the proceeding in relation to both the short-term and long-term interests of the parents affected. As noted by George Thomson (then a judge of the Ontario Provincial Court (Family Division)):

> Yet [the judge] must deal with the realization that a temporary order is often the first step in a fairly inexorable march to permanent wardship , and that there is a fairly unequal relationship between the protection agency and those parents with whom it works. [Emphasis added.]
> (G. M. Thomson, "Judging Judiciously in Child Protection Cases", in R.S. Abella and C. L'Heureux-Dubé, eds., Family Law: Dimensions of Justice (1983), 213, at p. 233.)

Judges must be cognizant of this reality when evaluating this factor in the circumstances of each particular case. Determining the seriousness of the matter must take into account the overall context and the serious effects of losing the ability to care for and guide the development of one's children.

122 Second, as my colleague points out, the complexity of the proceedings is also an important factor in evaluating whether a hearing without counsel proceeded in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The more complex the proceedings are, the more difficult it will be for the parent to participate effectively without assistance. As eloquently noted by Bastarache J.A., the complexity of the proceedings in the present case placed the appellant at a significant disadvantage:

> All other parties are represented. Ms. G. must be able to adduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses. There were 15 witnesses. Proceedings consumed three days. The interpretation of the legislation and of the powers of the Minister were at issue. The rules of evidence were at play. ((1997), 187 N.B.R. (2d) 81 , at p. 111)

The length of the proceedings, the type of evidence that is presented, the number of witnesses and the complexity and technicality of the proceedings must be important considerations in evaluating this factor.

123 As regards the third factor discussed by the Chief Justice, in articulating and interpreting this criterion, courts must be particularly careful to avoid including factors in the test for funded counsel that may make it more difficult for the parent when presenting her case on the merits: see P. Hughes, "New Brunswick's Domestic Legal Aid System: New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.) " (1998), 16 Windsor Y.B. Access Just. 240, at p. 250. The parent should not be placed in the Catch-22 situation of having to present himself or herself, in order to be granted the right to funded counsel, in a manner that makes it more likely that decisions will be made against him or her at the hearing itself. Nor should the parent face the disadvantage of the trial judge having already made findings of fact, at the right to counsel stage, that will be adverse to her or his interests at the stage of determining the best interests of the child. I agree with the Chief Justice that: "In proceedings as serious and complex as these, an unrepresented parent will ordinarily need to possess superior intelligence or education, communication skills, composure, and familiarity with the legal system in order to effectively present his or her case" (para. 80).

124 In considering this factor, the focus should be on the parent's education level, linguistic abilities, facility in communicating, age, and similar indicators. These characteristics will vary among those whose liberty and security interests are affected by child protection proceedings, but none of them will have considerable effects on the determination of the ultimate result of the Minister's application.

125 Taking into account all these factors, it is likely that the situations in which counsel will be required will not necessarily be rare. Proceedings will in many cases be complex, and the consequences, when the child may be removed from the home, are generally serious. Funded counsel must be ordered whenever a fair hearing will not take place without representation. The determination of this question must take into account the important value of meaningful participation in the hearing, taking into account the rights affected, and the powerlessness that a reasonable person in the position of the claimant may legitimately feel when faced with the formal procedures and practices of the justice system. The trial judge's duty to ensure a fair trial may therefore, when necessary, involve an order that the parent be provided with legal counsel, and trial judges should not, in my view, consider the issue from the starting point that counsel will be necessary to ensure a fair hearing only in rare cases.

126 In the result, I would dispose of the appeal as proposed by the Chief Justice.

Appeal allowed.

Constitutional law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Nature of rights and freedoms — Life, liberty and security — Miscellaneous

Applicant was paralegal with law firm that handled animal welfare law — Ontario Society for Prevention of Cruelty Animals was founded as independent charitable organization that had been given certain statutory powers relating to animal welfare — Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act was enacted to protect animals — For purposes of enforcement, Act provided that any inspector or agent of society had and may exercise any powers of police officer — Applicant's application to challenge provisions of Act on basis that they violated ss. 7 and 8 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was granted — Trial judge found it was unconstitutional under s. 7 of Charter to assign police and investigative powers per ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 of Act and sections were declared of no force and effect — Trial judge found impugned search and seizure powers required warrants under Act and clearly engaged security of person but applicant failed to establish that impugned sections were arbitrary in that they had no connection to purposes of Act itself — Trial judge found applicant's recognition of novel principle of fundamental justice that law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability was available and appropriate — Trial judge found society's investigators and agents while having police powers, were not subject to Police Services Act, which had comprehensive system for oversight and accountability for police — Trial judge found society had policy manual that it had created related to entering homes and seizures of property and that manual was not public document and unlike virtually every public body in Ontario, society was not subject to Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act — Trial judge found although charged with law enforcement responsibilities, society was opaque, insular, unaccountable, and potentially subject to external influence, and as such Ontarians could not be confident that laws it enforced would be fairly and impartially administered — Attorney General appealed, applicant cross-appealed — Appeal allowed, cross-appeal dismissed — Trial judge erred by finding that liberty interests under s. 7 of Charter were engaged, and by accepting novel principle of fundamental justice that law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability — Possibility of eventual imprisonment as consequence would make every s. 8 challenge into s. 7 challenge as well — Security of person was not engaged and warrantless searches of dwellings were not authorized by provisions at issue.

Constitutional law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Nature of rights and freedoms — Unreasonable search or seizure

Applicant was paralegal with law firm that handled animal welfare law — Ontario Society for Prevention of Cruelty Animals was founded as independent charitable organization that had been given certain statutory powers relating to animal welfare — Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act was enacted to protect animals — For purposes of enforcement, Act provided that any inspector or agent of society had and may exercise any powers of police officer — Applicant's application to challenge provisions of Act on basis that they violated ss. 7 and 8 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was granted — Trial judge found applicant had not established reasonable expectation of privacy for type of searches permitted by these sections and had therefore failed to establish that they were unconstitutional — Trial judge found while expectation of privacy was high when state was investigating criminal offence, there was very low expectation of privacy for regulation of business and social activity and these particular searches applied only to those who have chosen to engage in regulated activity — Trial judge found it was difficult to see how there could be reasonable expectation of privacy when seizure was for express purpose of providing animal with needed food, care or treatment to ameliorate its suffering — Attorney General appealed, applicant cross-appealed — Appeal allowed, cross-appeal dismissed — Individuals enjoy expectation of privacy in their dwellings, however, lower standard of reasonableness existed regarding powers at issue — Matter was regulatory as opposed to criminal, and dealt with prevention of harm as opposed to gathering evidence — Requirement for reasonable belief was sufficient safeguard against unreasonable search and seizure.

APPEAL by Attorney General and CROSS-APPEAL by applicant from judgment reported at Bogaerts v. Attorney General of Ontario (2019), 2019 ONSC 41, 2019 CarswellOnt 7, 52 C.R. (7th) 201, 426 C.R.R. (2d) 303 (Ont. S.C.J.), finding certain provisions of Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act unconstitutional.

Robert J. Sharpe J.A.*:

1 This appeal considers the constitutionality of the statutory authority conferred upon inspectors and agents designated by the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (the "OSPCA") to exercise the powers of a peace officer in the enforcement of laws pertaining to the welfare and prevention of cruelty to animals.

2 The respondent is a paralegal who was given public interest standing to challenge certain provisions of the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. O.36 (the "Act").

3 The application judge dismissed the respondent's argument that provisions in the Act creating offences were matters of criminal law and therefore beyond the legislative authority of the province. The application judge also dismissed the respondent's contention that certain provisions in the Act infringed s. 8 of Charter of Rights and Freedoms guaranteeing the right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure. However, the application judge accepted the submission that some of the Act's search and seizure provisions violated the s. 7 right not to be denied liberty and security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. He found that those search and seizure powers engaged the liberty and security of the person interests and he recognized a novel principle of fundamental justice, namely, that "law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability". The application judge struck down the sections of the Act conferring the powers of a peace officer on OSPCA officers and agents as well as two sections authorizing search and seizure.

4 The appellant, the Attorney General of Ontario, appeals the order granting the respondent public interest standing and the s. 7 order striking down three sections of the Act. The respondent cross-appeals the dismissal of the s. 8 argument and seeks to add that "law enforcement bodies must be funded in such manner to avoid actual or perceived conflicts of interest or apprehension of bias" as an additional principle of fundamental justice.

5 For the following reasons, I would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal. In my view, the application judge erred in finding that the liberty and security of the person interests protected by s. 7 were engaged. It is also my view that he further erred in accepting that "law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability" as a novel principle of fundamental justice. However, he did not err in dismissing the s. 8 claim.

OVERVIEW OF THE ACT

6 The relevant statutory provisions are set out in the Appendix to these reasons and may be summarized as follows.

7 The object of the Act "is to facilitate and provide for the prevention of cruelty to animals and their protection and relief therefrom" (s. 3). The Act constitutes the OSPCA and provides for its governance by a board of directors. While the OSPCA essentially functions as a private organization, the Lieutenant Governor in Council has the power to annul any by-law it enacts (s. 7(3)). The Act provides that the OSPCA shall appoint a Chief Inspector (s. 6.1(1)) who has the authority to establish qualifications, requirements and standards for inspectors and agents and to appoint, supervise and remove them (s. 6.1(2)).

8 The provision central to this challenge is s. 11(1) which confers the powers of a police officer on OSPCA inspectors and agents for the purpose of enforcing the Act and any other law pertaining to animal safety and the prevention of cruelty to animals.

9 The Act establishes obligations and prohibitions regarding the care of and harm to animals.

10 The respondent challenged two provisions, ss. 11.2(1) and 11.2(2), making it an offence to cause or permit an animal to be "in distress", defined as "the state of being in need of proper care, water, food or shelter or being injured, sick or in pain or suffering or being abused or subject to undue or unnecessary hardship, privation or neglect" (s. 1). The application judge rejected the contention that those provisions were ultra vires the province on the ground that they were, in pith and substance, criminal law. No appeal is taken from that aspect of the application judge's order.

11 The Act contains several provisions authorizing search and seizure. The respondent's challenge to the following provisions was dismissed by the application judge:

• Section 11.4 allows entry (without warrant into any place other than a dwelling, and into a dwelling with a warrant) where animals are kept for commercial purposes (exhibition, entertainment, boarding, hire or sale) to determine whether applicable standards are being met, provided that entry into a dwelling is not permitted without the consent of the occupier (s. 11.4(2));

• Section 11.4.1(1) gives inspectors and agents the power to demand production of records in relation to the same class of animals;

• Section 12(1) allows inspectors and agents with a warrant to search a building or place to determine if an animal is in distress;

• Section 12(6) allows for entry without a warrant into any building or place other than a dwelling if the inspector or agent has reasonable grounds to believe that there is an animal in immediate distress, defined as "distress that requires immediate intervention in order to alleviate suffering or to preserve life" (s. 12(8));

• Section 12.1 allows inspectors, agents and veterinarians who are lawfully in a place to take a carcass or sample of a carcass;

• Section 13(1) allows an inspector or agent who has reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in distress to order any person present or found promptly to take action to relieve the distress or to have the animal treated or examined by a veterinarian at the owner or custodian's expense;

• Section 13(6) allows for entry without a warrant if an order made under s. 13(1) remains in force to determine if the order has been complied with;

• Section 14(1) allows an inspector or agent to remove an animal for the purpose of providing it with care upon reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in distress and the owner or custodian cannot be found or if a s. 13 order has been made and not complied with.

12 The Act constitutes the Animal Care Review Board and gives it the authority to entertain appeals from compliance orders made under s. 13(1) and from animal removals pursuant to s. 14(1).

13 Section 22(2)(a) gives the Minister responsible for the administration of the Act the authority to make regulations prescribing the powers and duties of the OSPCA's Chief Inspector, including the power to appoint, oversee and establish qualifications, requirements and standards for OSPCA inspectors and agents. Pursuant to that provision, the Minister enacted O Reg 59/09, s. 1(1), requiring the Chief Inspector to establish such standards and to oversee inspectors and agents in the performance of their duties.

DECISION OF THE MOTION JUDGE ON STANDING

14 The respondent is a paralegal who works in the animal care area and owns animals. The Attorney General challenged his standing to bring this application. The motion judge ruled that the respondent lacked sufficient interest to satisfy the test for private interest standing but accepted that he should be given public interest standing.

15 The motion judge concluded that the respondent satisfied the test for public interest standing set out in Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 SCC 45, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 524 (S.C.C.), at para. 37: "(1) whether there is a serious justiciable issue raised; (2) whether the plaintiff has a real stake or a genuine interest in it; and (3) whether, in all the circumstances, the proposed suit is a reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the courts". There was a justiciable issue, the respondent had a genuine interest as a paralegal who works in the area of animal welfare, and the proposed application was a reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the courts.

16 Having granted public interest standing, the motion judge accepted the Attorney General's argument that he should strike from the record affidavit evidence alleging specific complaints that inspectors, agents and members of the Animal Care

Review Board had engaged in conduct that infringes or denies the Charter rights of non-parties. He did so on the basis that the public interest standing challenge was to the constitutionality of the Act, not to the specific exercise of discretion to which the affidavits were directed.

DECISION OF THE APPLICATION JUDGE

Federalism

17 The application judge rejected the respondent's contention that ss. 11.2(1) and 11.2(2) were, in pith and substance, criminal law and therefore beyond the legislative competence of the province. He concluded that the "matter" of the OSPCA is animal protection and prevention of cruelty to animals and that it fell within s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, conferring upon the province the authority to make laws in relation to "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". No appeal is taken from that aspect of the application judge's decision.

Charter s. 8: Unreasonable Search and Seizure

18 The application judge dismissed the respondent's contention that ss. 11.4, 12(6), 13(1) and (6), and 14(1)(b) and (c) breached s. 8 of the Charter.

19 He found that the purpose of s. 11.4 is to deal with commercial activity and that it is essentially regulatory in nature. He concluded that the respondent had failed to show a reasonable expectation of privacy when this provision was used for the purpose for which the section was intended, namely protection of vulnerable animals.

20 The application judge found that as s. 12(6) dealt with exigent circumstances and did not authorize warrantless searches of dwellings, it did not infringe s. 8 of the Charter, and he rejected the respondent's argument that the legislature should have included certain safeguards.

21 With respect to ss. 13(1) and (6), the application judge found that as s. 13(6) simply allowed an inspector to follow up on a s. 13(1) order in relation to an animal in distress, no reasonable expectation of privacy was established.

22 Finally, the application judge found that the exercise of the powers conferred by s. 14(1)(b) and (c) to remove an animal in distress in order to provide it with the care required to relieve the distress did not give rise to a reasonable expectation of privacy.

Charter s. 7: Liberty, Security of the Person and the Principles of Fundamental Justice

23 The principal focus of the application was the argument that the delegation of police and other investigative powers in ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 to the OSPCA, a private organization, violates s. 7 of the Charter. The application judge properly analyzed this issue in two stages: first, do the impugned provisions engage life, liberty or security of the person; and if the answer is yes, second, is the denial of life, liberty or security of the person in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

24 The application judge accepted the submission that ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 deprive someone subjected to those powers of liberty and security of the person. He rejected the appellant's contention that as a deprivation of liberty would only arise after prosecution, conviction and sentencing, the search powers were too remote to trigger a s. 7 claim. The application judge also found that the impugned provisions engaged the security of the person interest and he rejected the appellant's submission that the challenge to the impugned provisions should proceed under the more specific guarantee of s. 8.

25 The application judge then turned to the issue of whether the interference with liberty and security of the person was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. He rejected the argument that the impugned provisions ran afoul of the principle of non-arbitrariness, the only accepted principle of fundamental justice raised by the respondent. However, he accepted as a novel principle of fundamental justice that "law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability", while rejecting the inclusion of "integrity" as being too vague. He found, at para. 25, that while the respondent had "made a good case that the institutional integrity of the OSPCA may be lacking in the way it has been funded and structured", integrity was "essentially a synonym for morality" and a "vague concept" that did not amount to "a legal principle".

26 The application judge found that this formulation met the three-part test set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Malmo-Levine, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 571 (S.C.C.), at paras. 112-13 and Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth & the Law v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 76 (S.C.C.), at para. 8. It must be (1) "a legal principle" (2) that is "vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice" and (3) "capable of being identified with precision and applied to situations in a manner that yields predictable results."

27 The application judge found that accountability and transparency were basic tenets of our legal system. It was, he ruled, vital for the public to have confidence in the enforcement of laws, and that "a reasonable level of transparency and accountability is the cornerstone for that confidence." He was satisfied that the proposed principle was capable of being identified with precision and applied in a manner that would yield predictable results.

28 The application judge concluded that the impugned provisions contravened this novel principle of fundamental justice. As a private organization, the OSPCA lacked the required degree of transparency and accountability. OSPCA investigators and agents are not subject to the Police Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15, which provides a comprehensive system of oversight and accountability. He noted that while the OSPCA does have a policy manual relating to search and entry, it is not a public document and that complaints and discipline issues are dealt with by the OSPCA internally. Nor is the OSPCA subject to the Ombudsman Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. O.6, or the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F31. He agreed with the intervener's submission that "although charged with law enforcement responsibilities, the OSPCA is opaque, insular, unaccountable, and potentially subject to external influence, and as such Ontarians cannot be confident that the laws it enforces will be fairly and impartially administered."

29 The application judge declared ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 of no force and effect on the ground that they violated s. 7 of the Charter. He suspended his declaration of invalidity for one year to give the legislature the opportunity to consider alternative arrangements.

INTERIM LEGISLATION

30 We were advised during oral argument that there has been a change in the legislation since the decision of the application judge. The OSPCA has withdrawn from enforcement of the Act. Interim legislation, the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Amendment Act (Interim Period), 2019, S.O. 2019, c. 11, allows for the appointment of a Chief Inspector who has the power to appoint any person as an inspector under the Act. The legislature has yet to enact any other legislation to deal with the suspended declaration of invalidity.

ISSUES

31 The following issues arise on the appeal and cross-appeal.

1. Did the motion judge err by granting the respondent public interest standing?

2. Did the application judge err by rejecting the s. 8 challenge to ss. 13(6), 14(1)(b) and 14(1)(c)?

3. Did the application judge err by finding that ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 engage the liberty and security of the person interests under s. 7?

4. Did the application judge err in recognizing a novel principle of fundamental justice?

(1) Did the motion judge err by granting the respondent public interest standing?

32 The Attorney General appeals the order of the motion judge granting the respondent public interest standing. However, the Attorney General rested on his factum and made no oral submissions on this point. As it is my view that this court should decide the appeal and cross-appeal in any event in order to clarify the law in relation to s. 7, I do not propose to deal with this ground of appeal in any detail.

33 I would, however, point out that the combined effect of the order granting the respondent public interest standing and striking out the affidavits providing specific instances of the infringement of Charter rights resulted in this court having a less than satisfactory record. In Downtown Eastside Sex Workers, the case recognizing generous scope for public interest standing, the Supreme Court noted, at para. 74, that there was a substantial record of affidavit evidence as to the operation and impact of the challenged legislation, to "provide a concrete factual background" for the challenge. By contrast, on this application and appeal, the constitutional arguments were advanced in the abstract without a proper factual foundation. In my view, it would have been preferable had this challenge come before the court either on the application of an individual who had been subjected to the challenged statutory powers, or upon some other proper record, to provide a concrete factual context for the consideration of the constitutional issues raised.

(2) Did the application judge err by rejecting the s. 8 challenge to ss. 13(6), 14(1)(b) and 14(1)(c)?

34 As I have indicated, the respondent's cross-appeal of the application judge's dismissal of the s. 8 challenge is restricted to three provisions.

35 Section 13(6) allows for entry without a warrant if a s. 13(1) order remains in force. A s. 13(1) order can require an owner or custodian to take action to relieve the distress or to have an animal treated or examined by a veterinarian at the owner's or custodian's expense, where there are reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in distress and the owner or custodian is present or may be found promptly.

36 Section 14(1)(b) allows an inspector or agent to remove an animal for the purpose of providing it with care where the inspector or agent has examined the animal and has reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in distress and the owner or custodian is not present and cannot be found promptly.

37 Section 14(1)(c) allows for the removal of an animal where a s. 13(1) order has been made and not complied with.

38 The principal focus of the respondent's cross-appeal is that all three provisions allow for warrantless searches of and seizures from dwellings.

39 It is worth noting that the OSPCA's internal policy requires inspectors and agents to obtain a warrant before searching a dwelling. Because of the public interest standing ruling, the case was argued in the abstract without a factual foundation. As a result, we do not have before us a warrantless search of a dwelling and, if the OSPCA follows its policy, none may exist. Courts should not be asked to decide hypothetical cases of this nature. However, for the sake of completeness, I will express my view on the challenge to these provisions.

40 The application judge rejected the s. 8 challenge on the ground that a person subject to a search or seizure under the challenged provisions would not have a reasonable expectation of privacy, in part at least because of their non-criminal nature. I agree with the respondent that the application judge's analysis is unpersuasive. There can be no doubt that individuals enjoy an expectation of privacy in their dwellings.

41 However, as I will explain, the search and seizure powers at issue all favour a lower standard of reasonableness. Considering certain specific features of the impugned provisions that I outline below, I am satisfied that they do not violate s. 8 of the Charter.

42 The powers conferred by ss. 13(6) and 14(1)(c) depend upon a s. 13(1) order having been made. To make a s. 13(1) order, an inspector or agent must have reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in distress, that is, "being in need of proper care, water, food or shelter or being injured, sick or in pain or suffering or being abused or subject to undue or unnecessary hardship, privation or neglect" (s. 1(1)). A s. 13(1) order must be in writing. Upon being notified of the order, the owner of custodian is given the opportunity to challenge the order before the Animal Care Review Board. This means that entry into a dwelling can only take place after an inspector or agent has reasonable grounds to believe an animal is in distress, a written order has been given to the owner or custodian, and the owner or custodian has not complied with or challenged the order. While this falls short of the protection afforded by prior authorization obtained through a judicially approved search warrant, in my view, it is a sufficient safeguard against unreasonable search and seizure in the context of animal protection.

43 First, as the application judge observed, we are dealing with a regulatory rather than a criminal matter where a "less strenuous and more flexible standard of reasonableness" applies: Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425 (S.C.C.), at p. 506.

44 Second, these provisions deal less with gathering evidence and more with the prevention and alleviation of harm. We are dealing with exigent circumstances where the expectation of privacy yields to prevention of imminent harm: R. v. Godoy (1998), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 311 (S.C.C.), at para. 21. An animal in distress is unable to draw attention to its plight. More serious harm or even death may result if prompt action is not taken to relieve the animal's distress. Entry under ss. 13(6) and 14(1)(c) is only permitted where the owner or custodian has already been ordered to act to relieve animal distress. Seizure under s. 14(1)(b) is only permitted where an animal is in distress and the owner or custodian is not present and cannot be found promptly.

45 Given the nature of the search powers at issue, I would dismiss the cross-appeal with respect to ss. 13(6), 14(1)(b) and 14(1)(c).

(3) Did the application judge err by finding that ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 engage the liberty and security of the person interests under s. 7?

46 It is well-established that the analysis under s. 7 proceeds in two stages. The first question is whether the impugned law infringes life, liberty or security of the person. If the answer to that question is yes, the second question is whether the infringement is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. I turn first to whether ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 infringe the liberty or security of the person interest of those subjected to the powers conferred by those provisions.

Liberty

47 The application judge concluded that because the exercise of the powers conferred by ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 could lead to prosecution, conviction and imprisonment under the offence provisions of the Act, the liberty interest was engaged. In my respectful view, this amounted to an error of law for two reasons.

48 First, we are not dealing with an appeal from conviction. I agree with the appellant that viewed on their own, the powers conferred by those provisions are too remote from the possibility of conviction and imprisonment to engage the liberty interest. As the appellant points out, several steps would have to occur after the search before an individual would be deprived of liberty:

- The criteria prescribed in those provisions search would have to be satisfied to authorize the search;
- The search would have to yield evidence that could be used in a prosecution;
- The person would have to be charged with an offence;
- The person would have to be tried, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for the offence.

49 We were given no authority for the proposition that a power of search and seizure, without more, engages the liberty interest. The case law suggests the contrary. Two decisions of this court hold that the risk of imprisonment for non-payment of a fine imposed for a provincial offence is too remote to permit a challenge to the provincial offence itself on the ground that it infringes the liberty interest protected by s. 7: London (City) v. Polewsky (2005), 202 C.C.C. (3d) 257 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [2006] S.C.C.A. No. 37 (S.C.C.) (speeding); and R. v. Schmidt, 2014 ONCA 188, 119 O.R. (3d) 145 (Ont. C.A.) (selling unpasteurized milk). While the prospect of imprisonment was arguably more remote in those cases, they do stand for the proposition that where there are intermediate steps between the operation of a provision and deprivation of liberty, the court will not engage in speculation as to the possible eventual outcome to bring the case within s. 7.

50 Second, holding that the risk of imprisonment is possible as an eventual consequence of a search would turn virtually every s. 8 challenge into a s. 7 challenge as well. In my view, that would be wrong and contrary to established authority. As I will explain in more detail below with respect to security of the person, this would run counter to the principle that where a specific section of the Charter such as s. 8 is engaged, Charter scrutiny should be conducted under that specific provision and not under the more general guarantee of s. 7.

Security of the person

51 In my respectful view, the application judge also erred in concluding that the impugned provisions engaged the security of the person interest protected by s. 7.

52 To demonstrate an interference with security of the person, an applicant must show either (1) interference with bodily integrity and autonomy, including deprivation of control over one's body: Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 331 (S.C.C.), at paras. 66-67, or (2) serious state-imposed psychological stress: Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307 (S.C.C.), at paras. 81-86; Hamish Stewart, Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2019), at pp. 95-106.

53 The impugned powers plainly do not interfere with bodily integrity or control over one's body. No doubt it would be unsettling to have one's premises or dwelling subjected to a search under the impugned powers. However, as the application judge found, there is nothing in the record to suggest that a search of that nature would impose the level of state-imposed stress contemplated by the case law. In Blencoe, the Supreme Court warned, at para. 86, against "stretch[ing] the meaning of this right" by accepting lesser levels of stress as engaging the security of the person interest. It rejected the contention that a lengthy delay in dealing with a human rights complaint against the applicant, that had led to him suffering depression, humiliation and lack of employment, amounted a denial of security of the person.

54 Even in the case of a search that does involve an intrusion into bodily integrity (taking bodily samples), the Supreme Court of Canada held in R. v. Rodgers, 2006 SCC 15, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 554 (S.C.C.), at para. 23, that "because s. 8 provides a more specific and complete illustration of the s. 7 right" any s. 7 analysis is "redundant." This follows the more general principle that where a Charter claim falls within one of the provisions of ss. 8 to 14, the challenge should be considered under that specific provision rather than under the more general guarantee found in s. 7: R. c. Pearson, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 665 (S.C.C.), at p. 688; R. v. Généreux, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 259 (S.C.C.), at p. 310; R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668 (S.C.C.), at paras. 87-88; R. v. Knight, 2008 NLCA 67, 241 C.C.C. (3d) 353 (N.L. C.A.), at para. 48. In United States of America v. Wakeling, 2014 SCC 72, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 549 (S.C.C.), the applicant challenged a wiretap under s. 7. He argued that transparency and accountability were principles of fundamental justice. As I explain below, that argument was rejected at first instance. The Supreme Court of Canada did not find in necessary to deal with the issue of whether transparency and accountability were principles of fundamental justice, but ruled, at para. 52, that "the accountability concerns . . . are best dealt with under s. 8."

55 The failure of the respondent to show either interference with bodily integrity or serious state-imposed psychological stress should have ended the security of the person inquiry. The application judge held, however, that as ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter are specific illustrations of the s. 7 right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, the constitutionality of the impugned search and seizure powers could be considered under s. 7.

56 This produced an unusual result. The application judge dismissed the respondent's s. 8 challenge to some of the Act's search provisions under the Charter's specific guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure. The s. 7 challenge involved ss. 12 and 12.1, provisions that were not challenged under s. 8. However, in view of the application judge's reasons on the s. 8 challenge, it is difficult to see any reason why the application judge would have not ruled the same way with respect to ss. 12 and 12.1. Yet he allowed the challenge to ss. 12 and 12.1 under the more general constitutional standard found in s. 7 on the ground that s. 7 embraced the right conferred by s. 8.

57 In my view, the application judge should have confined his analysis of any challenged search and seizure provision to the specific s. 8 guarantee. I do not agree with the application judge's determination that a s. 7 analysis was appropriate in the "particular context" of this case to address the respondent's issues. There was a proper way to deal with the questions posed by the respondent. The issue should have been framed in terms of the reasonableness of the powers of search and seizure. To succeed, the respondent should have been required to show that conducting a search or seizure without reasonable standards to ensure transparency, accountability and adequate funding is unreasonable under s. 8.

58 The respondent submits that if we accept that the analysis should proceed under s. 8, we should still strike down ss. 11, 12 and 12.1 on the grounds that the absence of transparency, accountability and adequate funding renders searches conducted under these provisions unreasonable.

59 I disagree. I explain below why I reject the proposition that "law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency, adequate funding, and accountability" is a principle of fundamental justice. In my view, the proposed principle fares no better when framed in terms of the reasonableness of the impugned powers of search and seizure. The proposed principle deals with general issues of governance and institutional design, not with the reasonableness, scope or exercise of powers of search and seizure. The alleged shortcomings in the legislation are too remote from the definition of the challenged statutory powers and the manner in which those powers are carried out. To succeed on this ground, the respondent would have to show that the lack of measures to ensure transparency, accountability and adequate funding realistically had or risked having an actual impact on the exercise of the challenged statutory powers. There is no such evidence in this case. The respondent's complaint is with the general governance of the OSPCA, not with the definition of its statutory powers or the manner in which they are exercised.

60 The fact that the respondent had been given public interest standing to challenge the Act did not relieve him of the obligation to establish a Charter infringement.

61 I turn finally to the specific provisions challenged as being unreasonable. It will be recalled that the provisions at issue are ss. 12 and 12.1. Section 12(1) allows inspectors and agents with a warrant to search a building or place to determine if an animal is in distress while s. 12(6) allows for entry without a warrant upon reasonable grounds to believe that an animal is in immediate distress. Section 12.1 allows inspectors, agents and veterinarians who are lawfully in a place to take a carcass or sample of a carcass.

62 Neither provision authorizes the warrantless search of a dwelling. Section 12, dealing with exigent circumstances and the seizure of a carcass or part of a carcass, represents a minimal interference with the owner's or custodian's rights. They are arguably less intrusive of an owner's or custodian's privacy interest than the other provisions with which I have already dealt. For the reasons I gave with respect to the other provisions challenged under s. 8, I reject the challenge to ss. 12 and 12.1.

(4) Did the application judge err in recognizing a novel principle of fundamental justice?

63 The appellant submits that the application judge erred by recognizing "law enforcement bodies must be subject to reasonable standards of transparency and accountability" as a novel principle of fundamental justice. The respondent cross-appeals, asking that we recognize as a principle of fundamental justice that law enforcement be properly funded, amplified in his factum as the principle that "law enforcement bodies must be funded in such manner to avoid actual or perceived conflicts of interest or apprehension of bias." This is a re-formulation of the integrity argument the respondent made before the application judge.

64 I have no doubt that it would be a good idea and sound public policy to make all law enforcement bodies subject to reasonable standards of transparency, accountability and adequate funding and that they be properly funded. But not all good ideas and sound public policies are constitutionally protected or mandated. Our task is not to decide what would be sound policy. We are charged with the more specific task of deciding what the Constitution requires: see Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.), at p. 590: "Principles of fundamental justice must not . . . be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what society considers to be ethical or moral."

65 The fact that we are faced with a novel Charter claim does not, of course, mean that the claim cannot succeed. We are mandated to give the Charter a purposive interpretation, recognizing that it must "be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers": Canada (Director of Investigation & Research, Combines Investigation Branch) v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145 (S.C.C.), at p. 155. At the same time, we must recognize the importance "not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question" and ensure that the right or freedom is "placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical [context]": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 (S.C.C.), at p. 344.

66 The judicial interpretation of the Constitution should be broad and generous but must also be disciplined by the need to provide a reasoned justification based upon recognized principles and values of our constitutional order. These principles confer on the courts a legal duty to interpret and protect guaranteed rights in a generous manner. But because our mandate is legal, the capacity of the courts to right all perceived wrongs is limited.

67 As I will explain, since the enactment of the Charter, the courts have recognized what has become a long list of new principles of fundamental justice. But the courts have also rejected a long list of other proposed principles of fundamental justice. It is not always easy to determine whether a novel principle of fundamental justice should or should not be recognized. However, we are assisted in that task by considering the pattern revealed by the decisions in past cases and by the need to satisfy three criteria summarized by the Supreme Court of Canada in Malmo-Levine, at para. 113, and Canadian Foundation for Children, at para. 8.

68 The first criterion is that the proposed principle of fundamental justice must be "a legal principle" to satisfy two purposes: (1) that it "provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee"; and (2) that it avoids the "adjudication of policy matters": Reference re s. 94(2) of Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.), at p. 503.

69 The second criterion is that the alleged principle must be "vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice": Rodriguez, at p. 590. This was explained in Canadian Foundation for Children, at para. 8: "The principles of fundamental justice are the shared assumptions upon which our system of justice is grounded. They find their meaning in the cases and traditions that have long detailed the basic norms for how the state deals with its citizens. Society views them as essential to the administration of justice."

70 The third criterion is that "the alleged principle must be capable of being identified with precision and applied to situations in a manner that yields predictable results": Canadian Foundation for Children, at para. 8.

71 I agree with the appellant that the proposed new principle of fundamental justice meets none of these three criteria.

72 I turn first to the question of whether transparency, accountability and adequate funding qualifies as a "legal principle" capable of supporting s. 7 analysis.

73 The application judge gave as examples of transparency the open court principle and legislation relating to access to information. The need to support legal decisions with reasons was given as an example of accountability. In my view, those examples fall short of supporting what is required to constitute a legal principle that "provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee" and that avoids the "adjudication of policy matters". A legal principle that is used "as a rule or test in common law, statutory or international law" will satisfy first criterion of the principles of fundamental justice test: Federation of Law Societies of Canada v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 7, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 401 (S.C.C.), at para. 91. Transparency and accountability have a more limited legal pedigree. They are background values that the law sometimes takes into account in various ways and in various contexts. Courts may consider these values when interpreting the Constitution, statutes and common-law rules but they have not crystalized into the kind of operational or normative legal principle that can be independently deployed by a court to determine rights and obligations that will satisfy the s. 7 test.

74 Transparency and accountability were explicitly rejected by the Supreme Court of Canada in Wakeling, where the court stated, at para. 47:

> [W]hile the concepts of openness, transparency and accountability are important values or objectives, they are not legal principles, fundamental to the legal system, which can be identified with sufficient precision to be regarded as principles of fundamental justice pursuant to the test identified in Malmo-Levine. Rather, these concepts like the "harm principle" posited by the accused in Malmo-Levine are more properly regarded as matters falling into the realm of public policy.

75 I agree with that assessment.

76 In Malmo-Levine, it was argued that s. 7 precluded the criminalization of possession of marijuana because doing so would violate the principle that the criminal law could only impose imprisonment for conduct that results in harm to others. The majority rejected that proposition, explaining that while harm may justify criminalization, the absence of proven harm does not preclude legislative action. At para. 114, the majority explained: "the 'harm principle' is better characterized as a description of an important state interest rather than a normative 'legal' principle." In my view, the same can be said of transparency, accountability and proper funding. If the harm principle does not qualify as a legal principle, nor can the novel principle proposed in this case.

77 I turn to the second question, namely whether transparency, accountability and adequate funding are "vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice." In Canadian Foundation for Children, the Supreme Court of Canada held that while "the best interests of the child" is a legal principle that succeeds at the first stage, it fails to meet the second criterion as a principle that is vital to our societal notion of justice. The majority stated, at para. 10, that while the "'best interests of the child' is widely supported in legislation and social policy and is an important factor for consideration in many contexts", it is not "a foundational requirement for the dispensation of justice" because it is only one factor to be considered and it "may be subordinated to other concerns in appropriate contexts."

78 In my view, "best interests of the child" is much closer to being "vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice" than transparency, accountability and proper funding. The latter values are regularly subordinated to other concerns. For example, the right to access information under legislation such as the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act is heavily qualified by exemptions for matters such as Cabinet confidentiality, certain types of advice to government, the interests of law enforcement, and solicitor-client privilege. The open court principle is subject to many exceptions required to protect competing rights and interests. As explained by the British Columbia Supreme Court in Wakeling, at para. 49, with respect to transparency and accountability, "[t]here are areas relating to the administration of justice in which the application of these principles is either unworkable or rendered of secondary import because of other, more compelling interests." The adequacy of funding for law enforcement bodies is plainly a matter for political debate and subject to being reconciled with other competing demands on the public purse.

79 Finally, I do not think that the proposed principle satisfies the third branch of the test that it "be capable of being identified with precision and applied to situations in a manner that yields predictable results."

80 It is far from clear to me what measures would be required to satisfy this alleged principle of fundamental justice. Achieving transparency, accountability and adequate funding for any public body opens a complex and multifaceted inquiry that could yield a wide range of outcomes. In the words of Reference re s. 94(2) of Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), at p. 503, transparency, accountability and adequate funding "lie in the realm of general public policy" and they do not fall within the category of "the basic tenets of our legal system". Section 7 creates and protects individual legal rights and should not to be mistaken as a general guarantee of good governance. The design of a proper regime of law enforcement, one that ensures that peace officers are accountable, that their actions are subject to public scrutiny and that the law is enforced with integrity, are questions of public policy, not individual legal rights. The shape and contours of a properly designed system cannot be "identified with some precision" and we have been offered no standards that could be "applied to situations in a manner that yields predictable results."

81 Again, the observations of the Supreme Court in Canadian Foundation for Children are applicable. The majority held, at para. 11, that "best interests of the child" fell short:

> It functions as a factor considered along with others. Its application is inevitably highly contextual and subject to dispute; reasonable people may well disagree about the result that its application will yield, particularly in areas of the law where it is one consideration among many, such as the criminal justice system. It does not function as a principle of fundamental justice setting out our minimum requirements for the dispensation of justice.

82 If the "best interests of the child" principle falls short, transparency, accountability and adequate funding must fall well short. There is an extensive body of case law on "best interests of the child". It is applied every day in the courts of this province. Lawyers and judges understand what it means and know how to apply it. Transparency, accountability and adequate funding are, on the other hand, background values that some laws promote with varying degrees of stringency.

83 As Prof. Stewart explains in Fundamental Justice, at p. 124, recognizing a principle of fundamental justice creates a standard against which non-compliant legislation will be struck down. It is therefore "essential that the principle be sufficiently precise" so that "the public, the legislature, and other courts and tribunals understand exactly what is the defect in the legislation that leads to its invalidation and how that defect might be cured." The respondent and the interveners have failed to identify with any degree of precision the content of this alleged principle. There is very little legal guidance on what it means or requires.

84 I recognize, of course, that to satisfy the third branch of the principles of fundamental justice test, a proposed principle does not have to define a precise, bright-line rule and that the exercise of judgment may be required to determine its meaning in any given case. Obvious examples are the principles that laws must not be arbitrary, overly broad or grossly disproportionate: see Bedford v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101 (S.C.C.). However, a proposed principle does have to set out what the Supreme Court described in a similar context as an intelligible standard, capable of providing "an adequate basis for legal debate . . . as to its meaning by reasoned analysis applying legal criteria": Canada v. Pharmaceutical Society (Nova Scotia), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606 (S.C.C.), at p. 693. This requirement is satisfied in the case of arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality. Those principles require the court to "compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness": Bedford, at para. 123. The inquiry is disciplined, defined and confined by the right at issue and the contours and effect of the law that is being challenged. It requires the court to apply some general external value of good governance.

85 To accept transparency, accountability and adequate funding as a principle of fundamental justice would, in my view, create uncertainty and necessarily involve the courts in the "adjudication of policy matters". As the Railway Association of Canada points out, federal and provincial legislation confer law enforcement powers on a wide array of individuals, including railway constables, who are not members of any formal police force. The Criminal Code gives such powers to "every person" in many situations, including: assisting a police officer (s. 25(4)), preventing an offence causing harm to others (s. 27), and preventing a breach of the peace (s. 30). The principle of fundamental justice accepted by the application judge would, in my view, invite more questions than it would answer. It would inevitably involve the courts in complex policy issues regarding law enforcement and institutional design, issues for which legal analysis under the Charter is ill-suited.

86 I think it important to add as a final note that the operation of the Act is not entirely devoid of transparency and accountability. If a prosecution is brought by the OSPCA, any searches or seizures are subject to judicial and Charter scrutiny. Orders regarding animals in distress, including removal orders, may be appealed to the Animal Care Review Board. These features do subject the OSPCA to a certain level of accountability. Persons charged with offences are entitled to full disclosure of the fruits of an investigation under the principle established in R. v. Stinchcombe, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326 (S.C.C.), thereby ensuring transparency.

87 The Minister responsible for the administration of the Act has exercised the statutory authority to enact regulations "to oversee the inspectors and agents of the [OSPCA] in the performance of their duties": s. 22(2)(a) of the Act. These regulations require the Chief Inspector to establish standards for inspectors and agents, to oversee inspectors and agents in the performance of their duties, and where appropriate, to remove them: O Reg 59/09, s. 1.

88 The OSPCA has developed a detailed Investigations Policy and Procedures Manual. While the Manual is not a public document, it does set out the OSPCA's policies regarding searches, seizures, enforcement and disciplinary procedures applicable to inspectors and agents. The OSPCA's funding agreements with the province require detailed reporting to the Ministries providing the funding.

CONCLUSION

89 For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and set aside the application judge's declaration of invalidity. I would dismiss the cross-appeal.

COSTS

90 Both parties filed written costs submissions seeking costs of this appeal. The appellant submits that if successful, it should be awarded costs fixed at $20,000. The respondent submits that as a public interest litigant, he should be awarded $20,000, plus HST, regardless of the outcome of the appeal. None of the interveners asks for costs and no costs are requested against the interveners.

91 In my view, the circumstances of this appeal do not warrant an order requiring the respondent to pay the appellant's costs. The respondent was successful at first instance and following that decision the OSPCA withdrew from enforcing the Act. The appellant brought the appeal because of concern over the implications of the application judge's decision and to clarify the law. As is apparent from these reasons, I agree with the appellant's concerns and in my view the appeal was properly brought. That said, as the OSPCA had withdrawn from enforcement duties, the respondent has achieved practical if not legal success. I am not persuaded that the ordinary "loser pays" rule should be applied in these circumstances.

92 The case law recognizes a discretion to depart from the "loser pays" principle and decline a costs order in favour of a successful government litigant in constitutional litigation: see Incredible Electronics Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2006), 80 O.R. (3d) 723 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 74; Thompson v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2013 ONSC 6357, 118 O.R. (3d) 34 (Ont. S.C.J.). I would apply that discretion in this case and decline to order costs in favour of the appellant.

93 There is also a discretion to award an unsuccessful public interest litigant costs in Charter litigation. However, "highly unusual" circumstances are required to justify such an order which should be made "only in very rare cases": B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315 (S.C.C.), at p. 390. In my view, this case does not call for an exceptional order. The respondent is not a marginalized, disadvantaged person. There is no evidence that he is a person of limited means. He was given public interest standing and access to justice concerns are adequately met by departing from the "loser pays" principle and declining to order costs against him.

94 Accordingly, I would make no order as to the costs of this appeal.

C.W. Hourigan J.A.*:

I agree.

Appeal allowed, cross-appeal dismissed.

APPENDIX — Charter of Rights and Freedoms

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

8. Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, R.S.O., c. O.36

1(1) In this Act,

"distress" means the state of being in need of proper care, water, food or shelter or being injured, sick or in pain or suffering or being abused or subject to undue or unnecessary hardship, privation or neglect;

3 The object of the Society is to facilitate and provide for the prevention of cruelty to animals and their protection and relief therefrom.

6.1(1) The Society shall appoint an employee of the Society as the Chief Inspector.

(2) In addition to the powers and duties of an inspector or an agent of the Society, the Chief Inspector shall have the powers and duties that may be prescribed by regulation, including the power to establish qualifications, requirements and standards for inspectors and agents of the Society, to appoint inspectors and agents of the Society and to revoke their appointments and generally to oversee the inspectors and agents of the Society in the performance of their duties.

7(3) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may annul any by-law of the Society.

11(1) For the purposes of the enforcement of this Act or any other law in force in Ontario pertaining to the welfare of or the prevention of cruelty to animals, every inspector and agent of the Society has and may exercise any of the powers of a police officer.

11.2(1) No person shall cause an animal to be in distress.

(2) No owner or custodian of an animal shall permit the animal to be in distress.

11.4(1) An inspector or an agent of the Society may, without a warrant, enter and inspect a building or place where animals are kept in order to determine whether the standards of care or administrative requirements prescribed for the purpose of section 11.1 are being complied with if the animals are being kept for the purpose of animal exhibition, entertainment, boarding, hire or sale.

(2) The power to enter and inspect a building or place under this section shall not be exercised to enter and inspect a building or place used as a dwelling except with the consent of the occupier.

11.4.1(1) An inspector or an agent of the Society may, for the purpose of ensuring that the standards of care or administrative requirements prescribed for the purpose of section 11.1 are being complied with, demand that a person produce a record or thing for inspection if the person owns or has custody or care of animals that are being kept for the purpose of animal exhibition, entertainment, boarding, hire or sale.

12(1) If a justice of the peace or provincial judge is satisfied by information on oath that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there is in any building or place an animal that is in distress, he or she may issue a warrant authorizing one or more inspectors or agents of the Society named in the warrant to enter the building or place, either alone or accompanied by one or more veterinarians or other persons as the inspectors or agents consider advisable, and inspect the building or place and all the animals found there for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is any animal in distress.

(6) If an inspector or an agent of the Society has reasonable grounds to believe that there is an animal that is in immediate distress in any building or place, other than a dwelling, he or she may enter the building or place without a warrant, either alone or accompanied by one or more veterinarians or other persons as he or she considers advisable, and inspect the building or place and all the animals found there for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is any animal in immediate distress.

(8) For the purpose of subsection (6),

"immediate distress" means distress that requires immediate intervention in order to alleviate suffering or to preserve life.

13(1) Where an inspector or an agent of the Society has reasonable grounds for believing that an animal is in distress and the owner or custodian of the animal is present or may be found promptly, the inspector or agent may order the owner or custodian to,

(a) take such action as may, in the opinion of the inspector or agent, be necessary to relieve the animal of its distress; or

(b) have the animal examined and treated by a veterinarian at the expense of the owner or custodian.

(6) If an order made under subsection (1) remains in force, an inspector or an agent of the Society may enter without a warrant any building or place where the animal that is the subject of the order is located, either alone or accompanied by one or more veterinarians or other persons as he or she considers advisable, and inspect the animal and the building or place for the purpose of determining whether the order has been complied with.

14(1) An inspector or an agent of the Society may remove an animal from the building or place where it is and take possession thereof on behalf of the Society for the purpose of providing it with food, care or treatment to relieve its distress where,

(a) a veterinarian has examined the animal and has advised the inspector or agent in writing that the health and well-being of the animal necessitates its removal;

(b) the inspector or agent has inspected the animal and has reasonable grounds for believing that the animal is in distress and the owner or custodian of the animal is not present and cannot be found promptly; or

(c) an order respecting the animal has been made under section 13 and the order has not been complied with.

22(2) The Minister responsible for the administration of this Act may make regulations,

(a) prescribing and governing the powers and duties of the Chief Inspector of the Society, including the power to establish qualifications, requirements and standards for inspectors and agents of the Society, to appoint inspectors and agents of the Society and to revoke their appointments and generally to oversee the inspectors and agents of the Society in the performance of their duties;

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Life, liberty and security of person — Principles of fundamental justice — Fault
Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana and made possession punishable by imprisonment — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as unconstitutional as impairing accused's right to life, liberty and security of person as guaranteed by s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Prohibition provisions were constitutional — "Harm" principle, requirement that personal offences not directly harming others not be punishable by imprisonment, did not constitute principle of fundamental justice — Prohibition provisions were not arbitrary and penalty was not grossly disproportionate.
Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Right to equality before and under law

Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana and made possession punishable by imprisonment — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as unconstitutional as impairing accused's right to equality before and under law as guaranteed by s. 15(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Prohibition provisions were constitutional — Section 15(1) Charter guarantee prohibits discrimination on basis of certain fundamental personal characteristics — Desire to consume marijuana, lifestyle choice, did not constitute personal characteristic sufficient to trigger s. 15(1) analysis.

Criminal law --- Constitutional authority — Federal criminal law powers — Criminal power

Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as ultra vires Parliament and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Prohibition provisions were intra vires Parliament and lawfully enacted — Prohibition provisions were intra vires as valid criminal law.

Criminal law --- Constitutional authority — Federal criminal law powers — Peace, order and good government

Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as ultra vires Parliament and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Prohibition provisions were intra vires Parliament and lawfully enacted — Prohibition provisions were intra vires pursuant to general federal power to make laws for peace, order and good government of Canada.

Narcotic and drug control --- Scope of statutory regulation — Constitutionality of legislation — General

Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as unconstitutional and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Prohibition provisions were constitutional — Prohibition did not impair right to life, liberty and security of person or to equality before and under law as guaranteed by ss. 7 and 15(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Prohibition provisions were intra vires Parliament and lawfully enacted as valid criminal law and pursuant to general federal power to make laws for peace, order and good government of Canada.

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Demonstrably justified reasonable limit

Parliament enacted Narcotic Control Act which, inter alia, prohibited possession of marijuana — Accused challenged prohibition provisions as unconstitutional and matter proceeded to Supreme Court of Canada — Crown did not adduce evidence or provide argument on issue of application of s. 1 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Prohibition provisions were constitutional — In dissent, three justices held that prohibition provisions breached certain Charter rights — Dissenting justices held that Crown's failure to justify provisions under s. 1 properly resulted in order declaring breaches not to be reasonable limit.

Contrôle des stupéfiants et des drogues --- Portée de la réglementation adoptée en vertu de la loi — Constitutionnalité des dispositions législatives — En général

Parlement a adopté la Loi sur les stupéfiants qui interdisait notamment d'avoir en sa possession de la marihuana — Accusés ont contesté les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction pour motif d'inconstitutionnalité; l'affaire s'est rendue jusqu'en Cour suprême du Canada — Dispositions énonçant l'interdiction étaient constitutionnelles — Interdiction ne portait pas atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne ni au droit à l'égalité devant la loi, tels que protégés par les art. 7 et 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Dispositions énonçant l'interdiction relevaient de la compétence du Parlement et ont été adoptées légalement comme relevant du droit criminel et conformément au pouvoir général qu'a le fédéral de faire des lois pour assurer la paix, l'ordre et le bon gouvernement du Canada.

Droit criminel --- Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Limite raisonnable pouvant se démontrer

Parlement a adopté la Loi sur les stupéfiants qui interdisait notamment d'avoir en sa possession de la marihuana — Accusés ont contesté les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction pour motif d'inconstitutionnalité; l'affaire s'est rendue jusqu'en Cour suprême du Canada — Ministère public n'a présenté aucune preuve ni soumis aucun argument relativement à la question de l'application de l'art. 1 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Dispositions énonçant l'interdiction étaient constitutionnelles — Trois juges dissidents étaient d'avis que les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction portaient atteinte à certains droits protégés par la Charte — Juges dissidents ont statué que le défaut du ministère public de démontrer que les dispositions étaient justifiées en vertu de l'art. 1 avait donné lieu à bon droit à une ordonnance déclarant que les atteintes ne constituaient pas des limites raisonnables.

Pursuant to Regulations promulgated under the Narcotic Control Act (since repealed and replaced by the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act), marijuana was included in the schedule of prohibited-to-possess narcotics. By operation of s. 3(1) of the Act, simple possession of marijuana was a summary conviction offence punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 or a term of imprisonment of up to six months or both, for a first conviction. Subsequent convictions were punishable by a fine of up to $2,000 or a term of imprisonment of up to one year or both.

The accused M was charged with possession of marijuana and possession of marijuana for the purpose of trafficking. The accused M ran a co-operative association allegedly dedicated to the reduction of potential harms associated with marijuana use. Police officers raided the co-operative association's premises and seized a large quantity of marijuana which was intended for the personal use of the accused and other co-operative members. At trial, M brought an application for leave to adduce evidence in support of his argument that the Narcotic Control Act prohibition provisions were unconstitutional as ultra vires the Parliament of Canada and as impairing certain rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That application was dismissed and M was subsequently convicted. The accused M's appeal from conviction was dismissed and M appealed as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The accused C was charged with possession of marijuana. Police officers observed C sitting in a motor vehicle. The motor vehicle attempted to drive away from police as they approached, and one police officer detected the odour of marijuana emanating from the vehicle. The accused C produced a very small amount of marijuana which he had in his possession for his sole personal use. At trial, the accused C brought an application for a declaration that the Narcotic Control Act prohibition provisions were unconstitutional. The application was dismissed and C was subsequently convicted. His appeal from conviction to the Court of Appeal was joined to M's appeal and was dismissed. The accused C appealed as of right to the Supreme Court of Canada. His appeal remained joined to that of M.

Held: The appeals were dismissed.

Per Gonthier and Binnie JJ. (McLachlin C.J.C., Iacobucci, Major and Bastarache JJ. concurring): Each accused consumed marijuana in order to alter his brain chemistry and mental function. That psychoactive quality of marijuana was accepted by all parties. There was evidence in the courts below that the psychoactive qualities of marijuana carried a real risk of harm which was not trivial. Certain groups of persons are especially vulnerable to harm caused by marijuana use, including pregnant women and those suffering from schizophrenia. This is complicated by the fact that some vulnerable persons are not easily identified and separated from other users in advance. The use of the criminal law to protect those vulnerable persons is a matter of public policy within the legislative purview of Parliament. Parliament also has the legislative power to decriminalize marijuana use or to otherwise amend legislation with respect to marijuana where changes in policy occur.

While Parliament's decision is ultimately one of policy, nevertheless the Supreme Court of Canada had before it questions of law, namely whether the prohibition on marijuana possession was constitutional as within the legislative power of Parliament or whether the availability of imprisonment for simple possession was an unconstitutional infringement of any right as guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Narcotic Control Act, both generally and in respect of the criminal control of marijuana, is a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. It is intended to address broad social ills associated with drug use and drug trafficking — ills directly related to public health and safety and accordingly within the historical competence of Parliament. The protection of vulnerable persons or groups from harm is likewise a permissible use of the federal criminal law power. As the purpose of the Act's prohibition is a valid criminal law purpose and as it backed its purpose with a prohibition and a penalty, it was valid criminal law. Accordingly, it was not necessary to consider whether the prohibition on marijuana possession was within the ambit of Parliament on the basis of the residual federal peace, order and good government power.

Because simple possession of marijuana can result in a sentence of imprisonment, the Act prohibition on simple possession is subject to the s. 7 Charter life, liberty and security analysis. However, in the present case the prohibition simply cannot breach s. 7, as the accused's desire to consume marijuana is a bare lifestyle choice which is not entitled to protection under the Charter.

The proposition that the "harm principle", the idea that conduct must not attract imprisonment absent clear harm to a person other than the person performing the conduct, is a principle of fundamental justice is not valid. In order for a legal principle to be considered a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter, the principle must be founded on a broad social consensus which says that the principle is an essential element of the criminal law, and that the administration of justice cannot function fairly and properly without resort to and consideration of the principle. Furthermore, it must provide an articulable standard of measurement by which an impartial observer could determine whether or not the principle was being satisfied. In the present case, the accused did not demonstrate that the "harm principle" is a principle of fundamental justice. Assuming without deciding that the "harm principle" is a legal principle at all, it fails the principles of fundamental justice test inter alia because no broad social consensus exists that the "harm principle" is necessary to the full and fair exercise of justice in Canada. While harm to persons other than the actor engaging in the prohibited activity may be a reasonable foundation for a criminal prohibition, it does not follow that this is a necessary prerequisite to any such prohibition. In any event, the "harm principle" provides no benchmark or objective standard against which the exercise of Parliament's criminal law power can be accurately measured.

However, although the "harm principle" is not a principle of fundamental justice, Parliament is entitled to consider public harm when drafting criminal law. Proof of a risk of public harm of more than a trifling nature, which was proved in the present case, entitled Parliament to craft an appropriate criminal response. Such a response is not to be precisely weighed by the courts, as ultimately for the courts to do so would constitute judicial legislating beyond the proper constitutional role of the judiciary.

The arbitrary application of the criminal law power constitutes a prima facie breach of s. 7 of the Charter. In the present case, however, the prohibition on the simple possession of marijuana was not imposed arbitrarily. The use of marijuana creates a risk of harm to others, for example where a user in the active state of marijuana use operates heavy machinery in the presence of others, or drives on a public highway. Certain persons and groups are also at particular risk of harm to themselves or to others, including pregnant women and schizophrenics. Those facts establish that Parliament has a state interest in protecting Canadians from public harm, and their choice to do so by employing the criminal law is reasonable, although Parliament may have chosen other, non-criminal means to attack similar public harm risks, such as tobacco use.

The bare fact that imprisonment is available as a punishment, if it breaches the Charter at all, breaches the s. 12 guarantee against "cruel or unusual treatment or punishment". A breach of s. 12 will normally be found where the punishment imposed is grossly disproportionate to the conduct punished. In the present case, as simple possession of marijuana does not carry a minimum punishment at all and because any conviction results in a punishment determined in accordance with statutory and common-law principles of sentencing, the mere possibility of a sentence of imprisonment does not violate s. 12. Even a determination that a particular penalty violates s. 12 would not result in the remedy the accused seek, an order declaring the prohibition of no force or effect. The prohibition would still stand, and the matter would properly be returned to Parliament to craft a new and constitutionally acceptable penalty.

In point of fact, while imprisonment is available upon conviction for simple possession of marijuana, in practice it is seldom used as a punishment for simple possession. In the ordinary course, recreational users of small quantities of marijuana most often receive a conditional discharge, and the absence of a minimum sentence allows trial judges the freedom to craft appropriate sentences. The availability of imprisonment upon conviction for simple possession is intended as part of a broad anti-drug strategy and is not directed only toward marijuana. Absent the presence of serious aggravating circumstances, a review of jurisprudence indicates that imprisonment is not seriously considered as a punishment for simple possession of marijuana. Where imprisonment is imposed, and where that sentence may be excessive or otherwise unfit, an accused may appeal from sentence. A broad constitutional remedy is not required where a right of appeal exists.

The accused were engaged in deliberate, intentional lawbreaking. This lawbreaking was intended perhaps to call attention to their lifestyle choice. They could not be heard to argue that the effect of their deliberate disobedience was excessive or disproportionate where it would not be so for persons not engaged in deliberate lawbreaking. While a criminal conviction carries adverse consequences over and above the effect of sentence, this is not the effect of the Act's prohibition provisions, but of the administration of criminal law in general. Criminal law in general is constitutionally valid, and surely does not result in a breach of s. 7 of the Charter. In short, the prohibition on possession of marijuana and all of its effects on the accused, including the risk of imprisonment, are constitutional. The accused's allegation that the prohibition provisions are "ineffective" as effectively unenforceable was colourable as an excuse to avoid obeying the law. In any event, such an argument is properly reserved for consideration at the "reasonable limit" stage of s. 1 of the Charter, which requires the accused to first establish a breach of a substantive Charter right. This had not been established in the present case.

The prohibition provisions do not discriminate against the accused in a manner which infringes their rights to equality before and under the law as guaranteed by s. 15(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The accused's desire to consume marijuana did not constitute a "personal characteristic" fundamental to the accused which was properly protected by s. 15(1).

The trial judge in the case of M erred by failing to allow M the right to adduce evidence in support of his constitutional argument. The evidence was properly put before the court, if only to provide a record for use on appeal. The parties quite properly agreed to apply the evidence called by C on the constitutional issues on appeal and accordingly M suffered no prejudice.

Per Arbour J. (dissenting in part in respect of M's appeal; dissenting in respect of C's appeal): The Narcotic Control Act's marijuana simple possession prohibition provisions are a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. The legislation is intended to ameliorate a public health risk; it contains an express prohibition and a penalty for breaches of the prohibition. Parliament is entitled to consider the level of risk of public harm associated with an activity when crafting criminal law, and in the present case the prohibition provisions are not a colourable attempt to legislate in areas reserved to the provincial legislatures.

The "harm principle" is a principle of fundamental justice. Any legislative instrument which carries the risk of imprisonment for the commission of an offence which causes little or no reasoned risk of harm to persons other than the person committing the offence offends this principle. Accordingly, criminal legislation which conflicts with the "harm principle" violates the s. 7 Charter guarantee of life, liberty and security of the person. The risk of imprisonment must be reserved to punishment for conduct which causes some reasoned risk of harm to others beyond the de minimis level. An attempt to justify the risk of imprisonment based upon a vague apprehension of "public harm" is not sufficient. Most crime has a clear nexus between the offender and the victim or victims, providing an obvious incident of fault. The allegation in the present case that the risk of harm responded to was the risk of a collective harm was not sufficient to meet the "harm principle". Where public or collective harm is alleged, the state must show that the perceived harm outweighs the effect of enforcement on persons accused of the offence charged.

In the present case, the risk of collective harm caused by marijuana use did not justify the risk of imprisonment for simple possession. Harm to self does not justify the use of imprisonment, even where the harm to self may be serious, as can be the case with heavy marijuana users in so-called vulnerable groups. Other offences, such as impaired driving and dangerous driving, "catch" truly dangerous public behaviours which may be associated with marijuana use.

The argument that the issue of the availability of imprisonment should be properly argued as a potential breach of the s. 12 Charter guarantee against cruel or unreasonable treatment or punishment is misleading. The jurisprudence clearly indicates that s. 12 is merely one specific example of the general rights contained within s. 7, so that punishment may breach s. 7 even where it is not necessarily cruel or unusual, so long as it is, for example, disproportionate. Likewise, to suggest that the presence of "aggravating circumstances" would be necessary to consider the imprisonment of members of vulnerable groups who could cause public harm actually makes the prohibition provisions less tenable. It in effect states that persons who may harm only themselves and slightly, those recreational users not within vulnerable groups, may face imprisonment absent aggravating factors. Imprisonment is the most serious punishment available in criminal law, and should be reserved for offences causing harm to others. Parliament may not lawfully threaten all Canadians with imprisonment for conduct which can cause harm only to themselves on the basis that some other vulnerable person might hypothetically cause harm to others in a like situation. The simple possession prohibition provisions impair the accused's s. 7 Charter rights.

The marijuana possession prohibition does not offend s. 15 of the Charter, substantially for the reasons expressed by the majority.

A breach of s. 7 of the Charter having been established, it fell upon the Crown to justify the infringement in accordance with s. 1 of Charter. As the Crown led no evidence in support of a s. 1 justification, the prohibition could not be "saved" and must properly be struck out and declared of no force or effect.

Per LeBel J. (dissenting in part in respect of M's appeal; dissenting in respect of C's appeal): The "harm principle" is not a principle of fundamental justice. However, in the present case the marijuana prohibition provisions are arbitrary and thus breach s. 7 of the Charter. The provisions overreach, criminalizing harmless private conduct in order to respond to a perceived social problem. The overreaching breached the accused's fundamental rights, as Parliament's response to the social problem was arbitrary and no evidence before the court indicated any attempt to "solve" the social problems through less intrusive measures. Although few people may actually be imprisoned for simple possession of marijuana, the prohibition remains the law of Canada and thus a very serious risk attaches to private behaviour causing very little risk of public harm. The evidence that police agencies seem reluctant to enforce the prohibition provisions indicates that law enforcement agrees that the provisions overreach. In addition, the risk of a criminal record is significant, and some conduct more serious than that captured in the present case ought to take place before the significant opprobrium associated with a criminal record may attach.

Per Deschamps J. (dissenting in part in respect of M's appeal; dissenting in respect of C's appeal): The "harm principle" is not a principle of fundamental justice. It is too narrow to adequately describe the purpose of and need for the criminal law, as criminal law may properly be utilized to protect society in general.

Largely for the reasons expressed by LeBel J., in the present case, the inclusion of marijuana in the schedule to the Act and Regulations is overbroad and arbitrary, breaching principles of fundamental justice. The use of the criminal law, particularly where imprisonment is at risk, to prevent largely harmless private behaviour out of a bare apprehension of public risk is to employ an unnecessarily harsh blunt instrument where other, less serious means could have been employed. The result is a breach of the accused's right to life, liberty and security of the person as guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter.

As the Crown did not attempt to justify the breach of s. 7 of the Charter on the basis of s. 1, the Narcotic Control Act simple possession of marijuana prohibition provisions must be struck down.

Conformément aux règlements adoptés en vertu de la Loi sur les stupéfiants (qui a depuis été abrogée et remplacée par la Loi réglementant certaines drogues et autres substances), la marihuana a été incluse dans l'annexe des stupéfiants qu'il était interdit d'avoir en sa possession. Selon l'art. 3(1) de la Loi, la simple possession de marihuana constituait une infraction sommaire punissable, pour ce qui était d'une première infraction, par une amende maximale de 1 000 $ ou par une peine d'emprisonnement maximale de six mois, ou par les deux. Les condamnations subséquentes étaient punissables par une amende maximale de 2 000 $ ou par une peine d'emprisonnement maximale de un an, ou par les deux.

L'accusé M a été inculpé d'avoir eu en sa possession de la marihuana et d'en avoir eu possession en vue d'en faire le trafic. L'accusé M exploitait une association coopérative qui disait chercher à réduire certains risques associés à l'usage de la marihuana. Les policiers ont visité les locaux de l'association coopérative et ont saisi une importante quantité de marihuana que l'accusé destinait à son usage personnel et à celui des autres membres. Au cours de son procès, M a présenté une demande afin d'obtenir la permission de produire des preuves à l'appui de son allégation que les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction contenues dans la Loi sur les stupéfiants étaient inconstitutionnelles parce qu'elles ne relevaient pas des compétences du Parlement du Canada et parce qu'elles portaient atteinte à certains droits protégés par la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. La demande a été rejetée et M a par la suite été déclaré coupable. Le pourvoi interjeté par M à l'encontre de sa condamnation a été rejeté; M a interjeté appel de plein droit devant la Cour suprême du Canada.

L'accusé C a été inculpé d'avoir eu en sa possession de la marihuana. Les policiers ont aperçu C alors qu'il était assis dans un véhicule à moteur. Il a tenté de s'éloigner des policiers alors qu'ils s'approchaient; un des policiers a senti une odeur de marihuana provenant du véhicule. C avait une toute petite quantité de marihuana en sa possession, destinée exclusivement à son usage personnel. À son procès, C a présenté une demande afin qu'il soit déclaré que les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction contenues dans la Loi sur les stupéfiants étaient inconstitutionnelles. La demande a été rejetée et C a par la suite été déclaré coupable. Son appel à l'encontre de sa déclaration de culpabilité a été joint à celui de M et a été rejeté. C a interjeté appel de plein droit devant la Cour suprême. Son appel est demeuré joint à celui de M.

Arrêt: Les pourvois ont été rejetés.

Gonthier et Binnie, JJ. (McLachlin, J.C.C., Iacobucci, Major et Bastarache, JJ., souscrivant à l'opinion de Gonthier et Binnie, JJ.):

Chaque accusé a consommé de la marihuana parce que celle-ci agit sur la chimie du cerveau et sur les fonctions mentales. Les parties ont reconnu la nature psychoactive de la marihuana. On a prouvé devant les instances inférieures que la marihuana, de par ses effets psychoactifs, comporte un risque de préjudice non négligeable. Certains groupes de personnes sont particulièrement vulnérables au préjudice causé par l'usage de la marihuana, dont les femmes enceintes et les personnes schizophrènes. La situation est empirée par le fait que les personnes vulnérables ne sont pas faciles à identifier et ne sont pas déjà identifiées par rapport aux autres usagers. L'usage du droit criminel pour protéger ces personnes vulnérables constitue une question d'ordre public qui relève de la compétence législative du Parlement. Celui-ci a également compétence pour décriminaliser l'usage de la marihuana ou pour modifier les dispositions législatives portant sur la marihuana advenant un changement de politique.

Même si, ultimement, la question en est une de politique pour le Parlement, il n'en demeure pas moins que la Cour suprême du Canada avait devant elle des questions de droit: celle de savoir si l'interdiction d'avoir de la marihuana en sa possession était constitutionnelle parce qu'elle relevait du pouvoir de légiférer du Parlement; et celle de savoir si la possibilité d'ordonner l'emprisonnement pour une simple possession constituait une atteinte inconstitutionnelle à l'un ou l'autre des droits garantis par la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

La Loi sur les stupéfiants, tant de façon générale qu'à l'égard de son contrôle de la marihuana, résulte d'un exercice légitime par le Parlement de sa compétence en matière de droit criminel. La Loi vise à répondre aux graves problèmes sociaux qui sont associés à l'usage de drogues et au trafic de drogues, des problèmes qui ont un lien direct avec la santé et la sécurité publiques et qui, par conséquent, relèvent de la compétence historique du Parlement. La protection des personnes et des groupes vulnérables contre les préjudices constitue également un usage justifié que peut faire le Parlement de son pouvoir en matière criminelle. La Loi était une loi pénale valide, étant donné que son objet était un objet pénal valide et que celui-ci était appuyé par une interdiction et une sanction. Par conséquent, il n'était pas nécessaire d'examiner la question de savoir si l'interdiction d'avoir de la marihuana en sa possession relevait du Parlement en vertu de son pouvoir d'assurer la paix, l'ordre et le bon gouvernement du Canada.

Étant donné que la simple possession de marihuana peut donner lieu à une peine d'emprisonnement, l'interdiction contenue dans la loi à cet égard est assujettie à l'analyse en vertu de l'art. 7. En l'espèce, cependant, l'interdiction ne pouvait tout simplement pas porter atteinte à l'art. 7, puisque le désir des accusés de consommer de la marihuana constitue un choix de vie, lequel n'est aucunement protégé par la Charte. On ne pouvait validement affirmer que le principe du préjudice, soit l'idée qu'un comportement ne peut donner lieu à un emprisonnement en l'absence d'un préjudice clair causé à une personne autre que celle qui a le comportement interdit, était un principe de justice fondamentale. Un principe juridique ne peut être considéré comme un principe de justice fondamentale au sens de l'art. 7 que s'il repose sur un consensus social général selon lequel ce principe constitue un élément essentiel du droit pénal et si l'administration de la justice n'arrive pas à fonctionner de façon juste et appropriée sans avoir recours au principe et sans en tenir compte. De plus, le principe doit fournir une norme de mesure qui s'exprime facilement et qui pourrait être utilisée par un observateur impartial pour déterminer si le principe était oui ou non respecté. En l'espèce, les accusés n'ont pas démontré que le principe du préjudice était un principe de justice fondamentale. Même en présumant que ce principe est un principe de droit, il ne réussit pas le test applicable aux principes de justice fondamentale, notamment parce qu'il n'existe aucun consensus social général voulant que le principe du préjudice soit nécessaire à l'exercice juste et complet de la justice au Canada. Même si le préjudice causé aux personnes autres que celui ayant le comportement interdit peut constituer un motif raisonnable justifiant l'interdiction criminelle, cela ne veut pas dire qu'il s'agit nécessairement d'une condition préalable à une telle interdiction. De toute façon, le principe du préjudice ne donne aucun repère ni norme objective pouvant être utilisé pour examiner comme il faut l'exercice par le Parlement de son pouvoir en matière pénale.

Même si le principe du préjudice ne constitue pas un principe de justice fondamentale, le Parlement a quand même le droit de tenir compte du préjudice pour le public lorsqu'il rédige une loi pénale; la preuve faite en l'espèce de l'existence d'un risque pour le public d'un préjudice qui était plus qu'insignifiant autorisait le Parlement à élaborer une réponse appropriée. Les tribunaux n'ont pas à faire une appréciation exacte d'une telle réponse, puisqu'une telle appréciation de leur part reviendrait ultimement à les faire légiférer en dehors de leur rôle judiciaire constitutionnel.

L'application arbitraire du pouvoir pénal constitue à première vue une atteinte à l'art. 7 de la Charte. En l'espèce, toutefois, l'interdiction de simple possession de marihuana n'avait pas été imposée arbitrairement. L'utilisation de la marihuana risque de causer un préjudice à autrui, comme dans le cas de l'usager qui consomme de la marihuana tout en opérant de la machinerie lourde en présence d'autres personnes ou dans le cas de celui qui conduit sur une autoroute publique. Comme on l'a déjà dit, il existe des personnes et des groupes de personnes pour qui cet usage comporte un risque de préjudice plus grave pour eux-mêmes ou pour autrui, dont les femmes enceintes et les schizophrènes. Tout ceci démontre l'intérêt qu'a l'État de protéger les Canadiens contre des préjudices pour le public, mais également qu'il était raisonnable d'utiliser le droit pénal à cette fin, et ce, malgré le fait que le Parlement aurait probablement pu choisir d'autres moyens non criminels pour s'attaquer aux risques de préjudice pour le public, comme il l'a fait pour l'usage du tabac.

Si tant est que le fait que l'une des sanctions possibles soit l'emprisonnement puisse porter atteinte à la Charte, alors il s'agirait d'une atteinte à la garantie de l'art. 12 qui protège contre les « traitements ou peines cruels et inusités ». On conclut généralement à une violation de l'art. 12 lorsque la sanction imposée est exagérément disproportionnée avec le comportement sanctionné. En l'espèce, la simple possibilité d'une peine d'emprisonnement ne portait pas atteinte à l'art. 12, étant donné que la simple possession de marihuana n'emporte pas du tout de peine minimale et que toute condamnation donne lieu à une peine déterminée conformément aux principes prévus par la loi et la common law qui sont applicables en matière de détermination de la peine. Même si l'on concluait qu'une sanction particulière portait atteinte à l'art. 12, celle-ci ne donnerait pas lieu à la réparation voulue par les accusés, soit la déclaration que l'interdiction est inopérante. L'interdiction serait toujours valide et l'affaire serait à juste titre renvoyée au Parlement pour qu'il élabore une nouvelle sanction qui soit constitutionnelle.

En fait, même si l'emprisonnement peut être utilisé advenant une condamnation pour simple possession de marihuana, un tel usage n'est que rarement fait en pratique dans ces cas-là. Ordinairement, les personnes qui font un usage récréatif de petites quantités de marihuana sont pour la plupart condamnées à des peines avec sursis; l'absence d'une peine minimale permet aux juges de première instance de concevoir des sentences appropriées. La possibilité d'ordonner l'emprisonnement à la suite d'une condamnation pour simple possession fait partie d'une stratégie anti-drogues générale et vise seulement la marihuana. Une étude de la jurisprudence révèle que, en l'absence de circonstances aggravantes sérieuses, l'emprisonnement n'est pas sérieusement considéré comme une sanction pouvant être utilisée à l'égard d'une simple possession de marihuana. Un accusé peut interjeter appel d'une sentence lui imposant un emprisonnement lorsqu'il la considère comme excessive ou inappropriée. Devant l'existence d'un droit d'appel, il n'est pas nécessaire de concevoir une réparation constitutionnelle d'application générale.

Les accusés ont délibérément et intentionnellement enfreint la loi. Ils l'ont peut-être fait pour attirer l'attention sur leur choix de vie. Ils ne peuvent cependant pas soutenir que la conséquence de leur désobéissance délibérée est excessive ou disproportionnée alors qu'elle ne le serait pas pour les personnes qui n'enfreignent pas la loi délibérément. Même si une condamnation au criminel emporte des conséquences négatives de loin supérieures à l'effet de la sentence, ces conséquences ne résultent pas des dispositions énonçant l'interdiction de la Loi mais de l'administration du droit pénal en général. Le droit pénal est en général valide constitutionnellement et ne porte certainement pas atteinte à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Bref, sont donc constitutionnels l'interdiction d'avoir de la marihuana en sa possession ainsi que les effets de cette interdiction sur les accusés, y compris le risque d'emprisonnement. L'allégation des accusés que les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction sont inefficaces parce que difficilement applicables constitue tout simplement une excuse pour ne pas avoir à respecter la loi. De toute façon, un tel argument est à bon droit considéré seulement à l'étape de la limite raisonnable de l'art. 1 de la Charte, ce qui nécessite que l'accusé commence par établir l'atteinte à un droit de la Charte. Une telle atteinte n'a pas été démontrée en l'espèce.

Les dispositions ne faisaient aucune discrimination à l'égard des accusés qui eût pu porter atteinte à leur droit à l'égalité devant la loi, tel que garanti par l'art. 15 de la Charte. Le désir des accusés de consommer de la marihuana ne constituait pas une caractéristique personnelle essentielle des accusés protégée à juste titre par l'art. 15(1).

En ce qui concernait M, le juge du procès a commis une erreur en ne lui permettant pas de produire de la preuve au soutien de son argument constitutionnel. La preuve a été admise à bon droit devant la Cour, si ce n'est que pour fournir un dossier pouvant servir en appel. Les parties ont accepté à bon droit d'utiliser la preuve présentée par C à l'égard des questions d'ordre constitutionnel; par conséquent, M n'a subi aucun préjudice.

Arbour, J. (dissidente en partie à l'égard du pourvoi de M; dissidente à l'égard du pourvoi de C): Le Parlement a exercé validement son pouvoir en matière de droit criminel en adoptant les dispositions de la Loi sur les stupéfiants qui interdisent la simple possession de marihuana. La Loi vise à réduire un risque pour la santé publique; elle contient une interdiction expresse ainsi qu'une sanction pour le non-respect de l'interdiction. Lorsqu'il élabore une loi pénale, le Parlement a le droit de tenir compte du niveau de danger pour le public associé à une activité; en l'espèce, les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction ne constituaient pas une tentative d'empiètement visant à légiférer dans des domaines de compétence provinciale.

Le principe du préjudice est un principe de justice fondamentale. Il est violé par tout instrument législatif qui emporte un risque d'emprisonnement pour la perpétration d'une infraction comportant peu de risque de préjudice pour les personnes autres que celle qui commet l'infraction. Par conséquent, toute disposition pénale qui est incompatible avec le principe du préjudice porte ainsi atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne protégé par l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne. La possibilité d'emprisonnement doit se limiter aux sanctions punissant les conduites qui causent un réel danger de préjudice allant au-delà du niveau minimal. Une vague crainte de « danger pour le public » n'est pas suffisante pour justifier un risque d'emprisonnement. On retrouve dans la plupart des crimes une ligne de démarcation entre le contrevenant et la ou les victimes ainsi qu'une faute évidente. En l'espèce, l'allégation de la crainte de préjudice répondait à la crainte d'un préjudice pour la collectivité; cette crainte n'était cependant pas suffisante pour satisfaire au principe du préjudice. Lorsque l'État allègue un préjudice pour le public ou pour la collectivité, il doit prouver que le préjudice perçu l'emporte sur les effets qu'a l'application des dispositions sur les personnes accusées des infractions.

En l'espèce, le risque d'un préjudice pour la collectivité résultant de la consommation de marihuana ne justifiait aucunement le risque d'emprisonnement en cas de possession simple. L'emprisonnement ne peut se justifier lorsqu'il s'agit d'un préjudice qu'une personne se cause à elle-même, et ce, même lorsque ce préjudice peut être grave, comme dans le cas de grands consommateurs de marihuana qui font partie de groupes supposément vulnérables. Il existe d'autres infractions, comme, par exemple, celles de conduite avec les facultés affaiblies et de conduite dangereuse, qui permettent « d'attraper » les conduites dangereuses faites en public qui peuvent être associées à l'usage de marihuana.

Constitue un argument trompeur celui voulant que la question de la possibilité d'ordonner l'emprisonnement doive être à juste titre argumentée comme étant une atteinte potentielle à l'art. 12 de la Charte, lequel protège contre les traitements et peines cruels et inusités. La jurisprudence indique clairement que l'art. 12 n'est qu'un exemple précis des droits généraux qui font partie de l'art. 7; une sanction peut donc porter atteinte à l'art. 7 même si elle n'est pas cruelle et inusité, pour autant qu'elle soit, par exemple, disproportionnée. De même, la suggestion qu'il faudrait nécessairement la présence de « circonstances aggravantes » pour prendre en considération l'emprisonnement de membres de groupes vulnérables qui pourraient causer des préjudices publics rend dans les faits les dispositions encore moins soutenables. Cela veut dire que, dans les faits, les personnes pouvant se causer un préjudice léger, soit celles qui font un usage récréatif de la marihuana et ne font pas partie des groupes vulnérables, pourraient se faire emprisonner en l'absence de facteurs aggravants. L'emprisonnement est la peine la plus grave qui existe en droit pénal et elle ne devrait être utilisée qu'à l'égard des crimes qui causent un préjudice à autrui. Le Parlement ne peut légitimement menacer tous les Canadiens d'emprisonnement à cause d'une conduite qui pourrait seulement leur causer un préjudice à eux-mêmes, au seul motif qu'une personne vulnérable, dans une situation semblable, pourrait hypothétiquement causer un préjudice à d'autres personnes. Les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction de possession simple portent atteinte aux droits des accusés protégés par l'art. 7.

Par ailleurs, l'interdiction d'avoir de la marihuana en sa possession ne porte pas atteinte à l'art. 15 de la Charte canadienne, essentiellement pour les motifs exprimés par les juges majoritaires.

Une atteinte à l'art. 7 de la Charte ayant été établie, le ministère public devait justifier celle-ci conformément à l'art. 1. Le ministère public n'ayant présenté aucune preuve pouvant démontrer que l'interdiction était justifiée en vertu de l'art. 1, celle-ci n'était pas rachetée et devait à bon droit être annulée et déclarée inopérante.

LeBel, J. (dissident en partie à l'égard du pourvoi de M; dissident à l'égard du pourvoi de C): Le principe du préjudice n'est pas un principe de justice fondamentale. En l'espèce, cependant, les dispositions énonçant l'interdiction d'avoir en sa possession de la marihuana étaient arbitraires et portaient atteinte à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Les dispositions avaient une portée excessive; elles criminalisaient une conduite privée et inoffensive dans le but de répondre à une situation perçue comme un problème social. La portée excessive des dispositions portait atteinte aux droits fondamentaux des accusés, étant donné que la mesure élaborée par le Parlement pour répondre au problème social était arbitraire; il n'y avait aucune preuve devant le tribunal indiquant que l'on avait tenté de régler les problèmes sociaux à l'aide de mesures comportant moins d'ingérence. Même si peu de gens sont dans les faits emprisonnés pour simple possession de marihuana, il n'en demeure pas moins que l'interdiction fait loi au Canada et qu'un risque grave se rattache à un comportement privé comportant un bien faible risque de préjudice pour le public. La preuve que les corps de police semblent réticents à appliquer les dispositions démontre que les forces de l'ordre pensent également que les dispositions ont une portée excessive. Il y a de plus un risque important d'avoir un casier judiciaire; vu l'opprobre important se rattachant à l'existence d'un casier judiciaire, ce sont les crimes plus graves que celui dont il est question en l'espèce qui devraient y donner lieu.

Deschamps, J. (dissidente en partie à l'égard du pourvoi de M; dissidente à l'égard du pourvoi de C): Le principe du préjudice n'est pas un principe de justice fondamentale. Il est trop étroit pour inclure correctement tant l'objet et la nécessité du droit criminel, lequel est à juste titre utilisé pour protéger la société en général.

Essentiellement pour les motifs exprimés par LeBel, J. en l'espèce, l'inclusion de la marihuana à l'annexe de la Loi et du Règlement est excessive et arbitraire et porte atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale. Utiliser le droit criminel, surtout lorsqu'il comporte un risque d'emprisonnement, pour prévenir un comportement privé la plupart du temps inoffensif, en raison d'une simple crainte d'un préjudice pour le public, constitue l'emploi d'un instrument inutilement sévère, alors que d'autres instruments moins graves auraient pu être employés. En conséquence, on a porté atteinte aux droits des accusés à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de leur personne, tels que protégés par l'art. 7 de la Charte.

Le ministère public n'ayant pas tenté de justifier, en vertu de l'article premier, l'atteinte à l'art. 7, les dispositions de la Loi sur les stupéfiants qui interdisaient la possession de marijuana devaient être annulées.

de marijuana en vue d'en faire le trafic et qui a rejeté le pourvoi de l'accusé C à l'encontre de sa déclaration de culpabilité à l'égard d'une accusation de possession de marijuana.

Gonthier, Binnie JJ.*:

1 In these appeals, the Court is required to consider whether Parliament has the legislative authority to criminalize simple possession of marihuana and, if so, whether that power has been exercised in a manner that is contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The appellant Caine argues in particular that it is a violation of the principles of fundamental justice for Parliament to provide for a term of imprisonment as a sentence for conduct which he says results in little or no harm to other people. The appellant Malmo-Levine puts in issue the constitutional validity of the prohibition against possession for the purpose of trafficking in marihuana.

2 The British Columbia Court of Appeal rejected the appellants' challenges to the relevant provisions of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1 ("NCA"), and, in our view, it was right to do so. Upholding as we do the constitutional validity of the simple possession offence, it follows, for the same reasons, that Malmo-Levine's challenge to the prohibition against possession for the purpose of trafficking must also be rejected.

3 All sides agree that marihuana is a psychoactive drug which "causes alteration of mental function". That, indeed, is the purpose for which the appellants use it. Certain groups in society share a particular vulnerability to its effects. While members of these groups, whose identity cannot in general be distinguished from other users in advance, are relatively small as a percentage of all marihuana users, their numbers are significant in absolute terms. The trial judge estimated "chronic users" to number about 50,000. A recent Senate Special Committee report estimated users under 16 (which may overlap to some extent with the chronic user group) also at 50,000 individuals (Cannabis: Our Position for a Canadian Public Policy (2002) (the "Senate Committee Report"), vol. I, at pp. 165-66). Pregnant women and schizophrenics are also said to be at particular risk. Advancing the protection of these vulnerable individuals, in our opinion, is a policy choice that falls within the broad legislative scope conferred on Parliament.

4 A conviction for the possession of marihuana for personal use carries no mandatory minimum sentence. In practice, most first offenders are given a conditional discharge. Imprisonment is generally reserved for situations that also involve trafficking or hard drugs. Except in very exceptional circumstances, imprisonment for simple possession of marihuana would constitute a demonstrably unfit sentence and, if imposed, would rightly be set aside on appeal. Availability of imprisonment in a statute that deals with a wide variety of drugs from opium and heroin to crack and cocaine is not unconstitutional, and its rare imposition for marihuana offences (as a scheduled drug) can and should be dealt with under ordinary sentencing principles. A fit sentence, by definition, complies with s. 7 of the Charter. The mere fact of the availability of imprisonment in a statute dealing with a variety of prohibited drugs does not, in our view, make the criminalization of possession of a psychoactive drug like marihuana contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.

5 The appellants have assembled much evidence and argument attacking the wisdom of the criminalization of simple possession of marihuana. They say that the line between criminal and non-criminal conduct has been drawn inappropriately and that the evil effects of the law against marihuana outweigh the benefits, if any, associated with its prohibition. These are matters of legitimate controversy, but the outcome of that debate is not for the courts to determine. The Constitution provides no more than a framework. Challenges to the wisdom of a legislative measure within that framework should be addressed to Parliament. Our concern is solely with the issue of constitutionality. We conclude that it is within Parliament's legislative jurisdiction to criminalize the possession of marihuana should it choose to do so. Equally, it is open to Parliament to decriminalize or otherwise modify any aspect of the marihuana laws that it no longer considers to be good public policy.

6 The appeals are therefore dismissed.

I. Facts

A. Malmo-Levine

7 The appellant describes himself as a "marihuana/ freedom activist". Self-represented in these proceedings, his primary concern is with interference by the state in what he believes to be the personal autonomy of its citizens. He stated in his oral argument:

> I'm part of a growing number of such activists, who view cannabis re-legalization as a key part of protecting human rights and our Mother Earth, while, at the same time, helping to end [the] war on poverty.
> As you can see, I'm not a lawyer. I am, however, a cannabis user and a researcher, and I would like very much to be a cannabis retailer and perhaps grow a few plants.

8 Malmo-Levine does not deny that marihuana use can have harmful effects. On the contrary, since October 1996, he has helped operate an organization in East Vancouver known as the "Harm Reduction Club", a co-operative, non-profit association which recognizes some potential harm associated with the use of marihuana and seeks to reduce it. The stated object of the Club is to educate its users and the general public about marihuana and provide unadulterated marihuana at cost. It provides instruction about safe smoking habits "to minimize any harm from the use of marihuana", and requires its members to pledge not to operate motor vehicles or heavy equipment while under its influence.

9 On December 4, 1996, police entered the premises of the Harm Reduction Club and seized 316 grams of marihuana, much of it in the form of "joints". The appellant was charged with possession of cannabis (marihuana) for the purpose of trafficking. At trial, he sought to call evidence in support of a constitutional challenge but the trial judge refused to admit the evidence. On appeal, the majority of the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, Prowse J.A. dissenting.

B. Caine

10 On June 13, 1993, two RCMP officers on regular patrol observed the appellant and a male passenger sitting in a van by the ocean at White Rock, B.C. As the officers approached, the appellant, who was seated in the driver's seat, started the engine and began to back up. As one of the officers came alongside the van, he smelled a strong odour of recently smoked marihuana. The appellant Caine produced for the officer a partially smoked cigarette of marihuana that weighed 0.5 gram. He possessed the marihuana cigarette for his own use and not for any other purpose.

11 The appellant Caine's application for a declaration that the provisions of the NCA prohibiting the possession of marihuana were unconstitutional was denied at trial. The appeal was also dismissed, Prowse J.A. dissenting.

II. Relevant Statutory and Constitutional Provisions

Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1 (repealed S.C. 1996, c. 19, s. 94, effective May 14, 1997 (SI/97-47))

12 Section 2 of the NCA defines "marihuana" as Cannabis sativa L. and a "narcotic" as "any substance included in the schedule or anything that contains any substance included in the schedule". Marihuana became a scheduled drug when The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923, S.C. 1923, c. 22 (the predecessor to the NCA) was enacted by Parliament. The relevant provisions of the NCA, impugned insofar as they relate to the simple possession and use of marihuana, state:

> 3. (1) Except as authorized by this Act or the regulations, no person shall have a narcotic in his possession.
> (2) Every person who contravenes subsection (1) is guilty of an offence and liable
>
> (a) on summary conviction for a first offence, to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both and, for a subsequent offence, to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to both; or
>
> (b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years.

A. Trial Court

1. Malmo-Levine (1998), 54 C.R.R. (2d) 291 (B.C. S.C.)

13 Curtis J., after a lengthy voir dire, refused to hear evidence tendered to show the offence of possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking to be unconstitutional. He found that the proposed evidence was not relevant to his analysis under s. 7 of the Charter.

14 In his view, the freedom to use marihuana is not a matter of fundamental, personal importance, and such use is therefore not protected by s. 7 of the Charter. "There being no right to use marijuana created by the right to life, liberty and security of the person, the question of the principles of fundamental justice need not be considered" (p. 295). Malmo-Levine was subsequently convicted under s. 4(2) of the NCA for possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking.

2. Caine [1998] B.C.J. No. 885 (B.C. Prov. Ct.)

15 Howard Prov. Ct. J. heard extensive evidence about the alleged harm caused by marihuana. We will address her careful findings of fact in this regard later in these reasons. In the end, she held that she was bound by the decision in Malmo-Levine that the NCA did not infringe s. 7. Caine was therefore convicted under s. 3 of the NCA for simple possession.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal (2000), 138 B.C.A.C. 218, 2000 BCCA 335 (B.C. C.A.)

1. Braidwood J.A.

16 Braidwood J.A., Rowles J.A. concurring, concluded that the "harm principle" was a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7. "[The harm principle] is a legal principle and it is concise. Moreover, there is a consensus among reasonable people that it is vital to our system of justice. Indeed, I think that it is common sense that you don't go to jail unless there is a potential that your activities will cause harm to others" (para. 134).

17 In the result, however, he judged that the deprivation of the appellants' liberty caused by the penal provisions of the NCA was in accordance with the harm principle, and did not violate s. 7: "It is for Parliament to determine what level of risk is acceptable and what level of risk requires action. The Charter only demands ... a 'reasoned apprehension of harm' that is not [in] significant or trivial. The appellants have not convinced me that such harm is absent in this case" (para. 158). He therefore dismissed the appeals.

2. Prowse J.A. (dissenting)

18 Prowse J.A. disagreed that the threshold of harm justifying parliamentary intervention is harm that is "not insignificant or trivial". In her view, harm must be "serious" and "substantial" to survive a Charter challenge. She concluded that s. 3(1) of the NCA breached the appellants' s. 7 Charter rights in a manner inconsistent with a principle of fundamental justice. She would have adjourned the proceedings to permit counsel to make further submissions with respect to the justification of the breach under s. 1 of the Charter.

IV. Constitutional Questions

19 On October 19, 2001, the Chief Justice stated the following constitutional questions in the case of R. v. Caine:

> 1. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
>
> 2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?
> 3. Is the prohibition on the possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada as being a law enacted for the peace, order and good government of Canada pursuant to s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867; as being enacted pursuant to the criminal law power in s. 91(27) thereof; or otherwise?

20 In the Malmo-Levine appeal, additional constitutional questions were stated putting in issue the validity of the prohibition against possession for the purpose of trafficking in marihuana in light of s. 7 (fundamental justice) and s. 15 (equality rights) of the Charter.

V. Analysis

21 The controversy over the criminalization of the use of marihuana has raged in Canada for at least 30 years. In 1972, the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs (the "Le Dain Commission"), in its preliminary report entitled Cannabis, recommended that the prohibition against its use be removed from the criminal law. In 1974, the federal government introduced Bill S-19, which would have removed penal sanctions for possession of marihuana for a first offence and substituted a monetary fine in its place. The Bill, however, died on the Order Paper. At the beginning of the 32nd Parliament in 1980, the Throne Speech proclaimed:

> It is time ... to move cannabis offences to the Food and Drugs Act and remove the possibility of imprisonment for simple possession.
> (House of Commons Debates, vol. I, 1st Sess., 32nd Parl., April 14, 1980, at p. 5)

22 The trial judge in Caine estimated that over 600,000 Canadians now have criminal records for cannabis-related offences, and that widespread use despite the criminal prohibition encourages disrespect for the law. At the time of the hearing of the appeal in this Court, the government announced its intention of introducing a bill to eliminate the availability of imprisonment for simple possession. Bill C-38, as introduced, states that possession of amounts less than 15 grams of marihuana will render an individual "guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable to a fine" (s. 4(5.1)). Furthermore, the offence would be designated as a contravention, pursuant to the Contraventions Act, S.C. 1992, c. 47, with the effect that an individual convicted for such possession would not receive a criminal record.

23 These reports and legislative initiatives were directed to crafting what was thought to be the best legislative response to the marihuana controversy. Whether the Bill should proceed, and if so in what form, is a matter of legislative policy for Parliament to decide. The question before us is purely a matter of law. Is the prohibition, including the availability of imprisonment for simple possession, beyond the powers of Parliament, either because it does not properly fall within Parliament's legislative competence, or because the prohibition, and in particular the availability of imprisonment, violate the Charter's guarantees of rights and freedoms?

24 The legal issues arising on these appeals can be grouped under the following headings:

A. Exclusion of Constitutional Fact Evidence at the Trial of Malmo-Levine

B. The Narcotic Control Act

C. Evidence of Harm

D. Division of Powers

E. Section 7 of the Charter

F. Section 15 of the Charter

25 We turn, then, to the first issue.

A. Exclusion of Constitutional Fact Evidence at the Trial of Malmo-Levine

26 Curtis J. refused to admit expert evidence of legislative and constitutional facts relevant to the Charter challenge on the basis that, even if Malmo-Levine succeeded in establishing what he set out to establish, it would make no difference to the legal result. In the trial judge's view, "[t]here is no legal basis for hearing evidence in support of the defence challenge to the constitutionality of the marijuana laws; it is simply not relevant" (p. 296).

27 In our view, the evidence which Malmo-Levine wished to adduce, which was essentially the same as the evidence tendered in Caine, was relevant to his Charter challenge. His argument was clearly not frivolous. A trial judge is not required to listen to pointless, irrelevant or repetitive evidence that does not advance the work of the court, but here the proffered evidence was none of those things. Malmo-Levine was prepared to deal with serious matters in a serious way. Had the Crown been prepared to accept his evidentiary points, an admission by Crown counsel or an agreed Statement of Facts could have been filed to make unnecessary the hearing of viva voce evidence. In the absence of any such Crown admissions, we agree with the British Columbia Court of Appeal that in the circumstances of this case the trial judge erred in excluding this "legislative fact" evidence. In the Caine case, the trial judge took judicial notice of certain government reports and documents, and proceeded to hear viva voce expert evidence on the more debatable aspects of the marihuana controversy. This was the correct procedure.

28 While the courts apply the requirements of judicial notice less stringently to the admission of legislative fact than to adjudicative fact (Danson v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1086 (S.C.C.), at p. 1099), courts should nevertheless proceed cautiously to take judicial notice even as "legislative facts" of matters that are reasonably open to dispute, particularly where they relate to an issue that could be dispositive: R. v. Find, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 863, 2001 SCC 32 (S.C.C.); Public School Boards' Assn. (Alberta) v. Alberta (Attorney General), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 44, 2000 SCC 2 (S.C.C.). The evidence of harm, or the lack of it, was central to the argument raised by both Malmo-Levine and Caine. They regarded it as dispositive. Moreover, much of the evidence of "harm" was controversial, and needed to be tested by cross-examination.

29 Curtis J. was clearly unimpressed by what Malmo-Levine wished to establish. In some aspects, we have reached the same conclusion. However, with respect, the trial judge ought to have admitted the evidence despite his misgivings in the circumstances so as to permit Malmo-Levine to put forward a full record in the event of an appeal.

30 The complications that would otherwise have attended the hearing of the appeal however were obviated by the parties' agreement to treat the Caine evidence of legislative fact as equally applicable to Malmo-Levine's appeal. In the result, we agree with the Court of Appeal that the trial judge's error did not, in those circumstances, prejudice Malmo-Levine.

B. The Narcotic Control Act

1. History of the NCA

31 The NCA is structured as an omnibus measure covering all controlled drugs including heroin, crack cocaine and opium. The first such Act was passed by Parliament in 1908 in the form of An Act to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of Opium for other than medicinal purposes, S.C. 1908, c. 50, which aimed to control the use of narcotics for non-medicinal purposes. In 1911, this statute was replaced by The Opium and Drug Act, S.C. 1911, c. 17, which added prohibitions with regards to cocaine, morphine and eucaine. In 1923, Parliament enacted a consolidated Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923, S.C. 1923, c. 22, which added cannabis to the list of prohibited drugs. There was no discussion or debate in the house as to why this drug was added. In 1932, a number of important amendments were made in the Act to amend The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929, S.C. 1932, c. 20, referring to both synthetic and natural drugs. By 1938, the Act prohibited over 15 scheduled drugs (S.C. 1938, c. 9) (see Senate Committee Report, vol. II, at pp. 256-58).

32 In 1954, the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act was amended, and the offence of possession was supplemented by a new offence: "possession ... for the purpose of trafficking" (S.C. 1954, c. 38, s. 3). A reverse onus applied to this offence, meaning that those possessing large quantities of narcotics had to prove that they were not in possession for the purpose of trafficking (Senate Committee Report, vol. II, at p. 264). The Act contained much harsher penalties for trafficking than for possession, leading Braidwood J.A. to conclude that "Parliament's primary purpose was to stamp out the drug traffic and punish the traffickers" (para. 81).

33 Less than a decade later, Parliament replaced the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act with the Narcotic Control Act, S.C. 1960-61, c. 35, which gave effect to Canada's international commitments under the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, Can. T.S. 1964 No. 30. When debating the Bill, the Minister of National Health characterized marihuana as a gateway drug, stating that "[i]t... may well provide a stepping stone to addiction to heroin" (House of Commons Debates, vol. VI, 4th Sess., 24th Parl, June 7, 1961, at p. 5981). This strategy was to try to treat and cure the "evil" of marihuana by reducing the supply of drugs through stiff penalties, and reducing the demand for drugs by providing treatment for existing addicts.

34 In 1997, the NCA and Parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act were repealed and replaced by the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19 ("CDSA"). The new Act was designed to discharge Canada's more recent international obligations with regard to narcotics. It introduced a legislative framework for the import, export, distribution and use of substances scheduled under previous legislation (Senate Committee Report, vol. II, at p. 286). More than 150 substances now appear in the schedules to the CDSA.

2. Sanctions under the NCA

35 Since the enactment of the Opium Act in 1908, the sanctions for drug possession have been steadily decreasing. In 1929, the penalty for the offence of possession was a minimum of six months to a maximum of seven years or a fine of between $200 and $1,000, or both. It was also within the discretion of the court to sentence offenders to hard labour or a whipping: S.C. 1929, c. 49, s. 4. See, e.g., R. v. Forbes (1937), 69 C.C.C. 140 (B.C. Co. Ct.) (accused sentenced to 18 months of hard labour plus a $200 fine for possession of marihuana).

36 With the amendment of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act in 1954, penalties for offences involving trafficking increased. For simple possession however, the availability of hard labour was removed. The mandatory six-month prison sentence was repealed in 1961 when the Narcotic Control Act was enacted. However, the 1961 Act provided, under s. 17(1), that if the accused was a drug addict, the court could impose custody for treatment for an indeterminate period in lieu of another sentence.

37 In 1969, possession was redesignated as a hybrid offence, and the penalty on summary conviction for possession carried a maximum fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or both for a first offence and, for a subsequent offence, a fine not exceeding $2,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or both: S.C. 1968-69, c. 41, s. 12. The penalties are heavier, of course, if the Crown proceeds by indictment. These provisions were still in effect when the NCA was repealed in 1996.

3. Statutory Framework of the NCA

38 Parliament did not attach the penalty of imprisonment directly to marihuana offences. Rather, the NCA states at s. 3(1) that "[e]xcept as authorized by this Act or the regulations, no person shall have a narcotic in his possession". Narcotics are defined in the schedules to the NCA. Marihuana is a scheduled drug. The trial judge found that while marihuana is a psychoactive drug, it is not (medically speaking) a narcotic. It is deemed to be a "narcotic" only for the parliamentary purposes of the NCA schedule.

39 Various attacks were made on this statutory vehicle in the companion Ontario appeal, R. v. Clay, 2003 SCC 75 (S.C.C.), including allegations of overbreadth, and are considered further in our reasons for rejecting that appeal, released concurrently.

C. Evidence of Harm

40 The evidentiary issue at the core of the appellants' constitutional challenge is the "harm principle", and the contention that possession of marihuana for personal use is a "victimless crime". The appellants say that even with respect to the user himself or herself there is no cogent evidence of "significant" or "non-trivial" harm.

41 Malmo-Levine, a self-styled "chronic user", does not deny the existence of harm. The name of his organization, after all, is the "Harm Reduction Club". In his factum, he acknowledges that "Cannabis misuse can cause harm". In oral argument he said that > my purpose here was to try to shift the debate from whether the harms are trivial, insignificant, to whether the harms are mitigatable and reducible.

>
> vulnerable groups, the chronic users, the mentally ill, the pregnant mothers, and the immature youth, are the ones that need harm reduction the most.

1. Admissions by the Appellants

42 The appellants Malmo-Levine, Caine and Clay filed with the Court a Joint Statement of Legislative Facts in which they make the following limited admissions:

(i) Dependency

The appellants state that "[t]here appears to be little or no risk of physical addiction arising from cannabis use; however, a small percentage of users do seemingly develop problems with psychological dependence.... Psychological dependence is reportedly experienced by only 2% of all cannabis users".

(ii) Driving, flying, or operating complex machinery

The appellants acknowledge that "[c]annabis may be contributing to accidents". Note, as well, that the following is printed on the Harm Reduction Club's Membership Card (run by Mr. Malmo-Levine): "I, [name], promise not to operate any heavy machinery while impaired on any marijuana".

(iii) Damage to lungs

The appellants acknowledge that "Dr. Tashkin has recently demonstrated that chronic cannabis smoking will lead to chronic bronchial inflammation".

(iv) Schizophrenia and psychosis

The appellants state that "[c]annabis has not been shown to cause psychoses or schizophrenia, although there is some question as to whether or not cannabis can modify the course of a preexisting psychosis."

(v) Amotivational syndrome

The appellants state that "diminished motivation may be a symptom of chronic intoxication but one which dissipates upon cessation of use".

(vi) Effect on fetus/newborns

The appellants state that "[w]hile some tests have shown some impairment of memory, verbal ability and verbal expression of ideas in school age children, the changes were measurably small. More importantly, however, these minimal testing differences have not been linked to poor school performance in later years."

(vii) Reproductive system

The appellants state that "[t]here may ... be a brief or acute decrease of sex hormone level in the brain, but this level soon returns to normal even without the complete cessation of cannabis smoking".

43 There is no doubt that Canadian society has become much more sceptical about the alleged harm caused by the use of marihuana since the days when Emily Murphy, an Edmonton magistrate, warned that persons under the influence of marihuana "los[e] all sense of moral responsibility. ... are immune to pain ... becom[ing] raving maniacs... liable to kill... using the most savage methods of cruelty" (The Black Candle (1922), at pp. 332-33). However, to exonerate marihuana from such extreme forms of denunciation is not to say it is harmless.

2. The Le Dain Commission Report

44 The Le Dain Commission, established in 1969 and reporting in 1972, recommended decriminalization of marihuana but nevertheless identified various concerns regarding its use, including the following four identified by the majority of commissioners as the major areas of social concern (at p. 268):

1. "the effect of cannabis on adolescent maturation;"

2. "the implications of cannabis use for the safe operation of motor vehicles and other machinery;"

3. "the possibility that the long-term heavy use of cannabis will result in a significant amount of mental deterioration and disorder;" and

4. "the role played by cannabis in the development and spread of multi-drug use."

45 Research and further studies in the intervening 30 years have caused reconsideration of some of these findings.

3. The Trial Judge's Findings in Caine

46 Howard Prov. Ct. J., in response to some of the more strident warnings of the harm allegedly caused by marihuana use, reviewed the extensive evidence before her court to put in perspective the potential harms associated with the use of marihuana, as presently understood, as follows (at para. 40):

1. the occasional to moderate use of marihuana by a healthy adult is not ordinarily harmful to health, even if used over a long period of time;

2. there is no conclusive evidence demonstrating any irreversible organic or mental damage to the user, except in relation to the lungs and then only to those of a chronic, heavy user such as a person who smokes at least 1 and probably 3-5 marihuana joints per day;

3. there is no evidence demonstrating irreversible, organic or mental damage from the use of marihuana by an ordinary healthy adult who uses occasionally or moderately;

4. marihuana use does cause alteration of mental function and as such should not be used in conjunction with driving, flying or operating complex machinery;

5. there is no evidence that marihuana use induces psychosis in ordinary healthy adults who use [marihuana] occasionally or moderately and, in relation to the heavy user, the evidence of marihuana psychosis appears to arise only in those having a predisposition towards such a mental illness;

6. marihuana is not addictive;

7. there is a concern over potential dependence in heavy users, but marihuana is not a highly reinforcing type of drug, like heroin or cocaine and consequently physical dependence is not a major problem; psychological dependence may be a problem for the chronic user;

8. there is no causal relationship between marihuana use and criminality;

9. there is no evidence that marihuana is a gateway drug and the vast majority of marihuana users do not go on to try hard drugs ....

10. marihuana does not make people aggressive or violent, but on the contrary it tends to make them passive and quiet;

11. there have been no deaths from the use of marihuana;

12. there is no evidence of an amotivational syndrome, although chronic use of marihuana could decrease motivation, especially if such a user smokes so often as to be in a state of chronic intoxication;

13. assuming current rates of consumption remain stable, the health related costs of marihuana use are very, very small in comparison with those costs associated with tobacco and alcohol consumption.

47 Having concluded that the use of marihuana is not as harmful as is sometimes claimed, the trial judge went on to state in Caine that marihuana is not "a completely harmless drug for all individual users" (para. 42). She stated at paras. 121-22:

> The evidence before me demonstrates that there is a reasonable basis for believing that the following health risks exist with [marihuana use].
> There is a general risk of harm to the users of marihuana from the acute effects of the drug, but these adverse effects are rare and transient. Persons experiencing the acute effects of the drug will be less adept at driving, flying and other activities involving complex machinery. In this regard they represent a risk of harm to others in society. At current rates of use, accidents caused by users under the influence of marihuana cannot be said to be significant.

48 Key to Howard Prov. Ct. J.'s findings was the identification of perhaps 50,000 chronic users, who cannot be identified in advance, but who pose both a risk to themselves and a potential cost to society at paras. 123-26:

> There is also a risk that any individual who chooses to become a casual user, may end up being a chronic user of marihuana, or a member of one of the vulnerable persons identified in the materials. It is not possible to identify these persons in advance.
>
> As to the chronic users of marihuana, there are health risks for such persons. The health problems are serious ones but they arise primarily from the act of smoking rather than from the active ingredients in marihuana. Approximately 5% of all marihuana users are chronic users. At current rates of use, this comes to approximately 50,000 persons. There is a risk that, upon legalization, rates of use will increase, and with that the absolute number of chronic users will increase.
> In addition, there are health risks for those vulnerable persons identified in the materials. There is no information before me to suggest how many people might fall into this group. Given that it includes young adolescents who may be more prone to becoming chronic users, I would not estimate this group to be min[u]seule.
>
> All of the risks noted above carry with them a cost to society, both to the health care and welfare systems. At current rates of use, these costs are negligible compared to the costs associated with alcohol and drugs [sic]. There is a risk that, with legalization, user rates will increase and so will these costs.
> [Emphasis added.]

49 Over 20 years after the Le Dain Commission's Report, the Hall Report was released in Australia. The trial judge noted in Caine that "[t]here was general agreement among the witnesses who appeared before me (save perhaps for Dr. Morgan) that the conclusions contained in the Hall Report were sound ... based on the scientific information available at this time" (par. 48). The 1994 Hall Report found the following to be "chronic effects":

> [T]he major probable adverse effects [from chronic use] appear to be:
>
> - respiratory diseases associated with smoking as the method of administration, such as chronic bronchitis, and the occurrence of histopathological changes that may be precursors to the development of malignancy;
> - development of a cannabis dependence syndrome, characterized by an inability to abstain from or to control cannabis use;
> - subtle forms of cognitive impairment, most particularly of attention and memory, which persist while the user remains chronically intoxicated, and may or may not be reversible after prolonged abstinence from cannabis.
>
> [T]he major possible adverse effects [from chronic use that is, effects] which remain to be confirmed by further research [are]:
>
> - an increased risk of developing cancers of the aerodigestive tract, i.e. oral cavity, pharynx, and oesophagus;

> • an increased risk of leukemia among offspring exposed while in utero;
>
> • a decline in occupational performance marked by underachievement in adults in occupations requiring high level cognitive skills, and impaired educational attainment in adolescents;
>
> • birth defects occurring among children of women who used cannabis during their pregnancies.
> (W. Hall, N. Solowij and J. Lemon, National Drug Strategy: The health and psychological consequences of cannabis use (1994) (the "Hall Report"), at p. ix (emphasis in original))

50 In 2001, a revised version of the Hall Report was released. Its conclusions are similar to the 1994 Report except that the cognitive impairment probability was demoted to a possibility, the cancer risk (from smoking marihuana) was promoted from a possibility to a probability and the risks of leukemia and birth defects were no longer listed.

51 The trial judge noted that the 1994 Hall Report identified three traditional "high risk groups" (at para. 46):

> (1) Adolescents with a history of poor school performance ...
>
> (2) Women of childbearing age ...; and
> (3) Persons with pre-existing diseases such as cardiovascular diseases, respiratory diseases, schizophrenia or other drug dependencies ....

The inclusion of "women of childbearing age" may have to be reconsidered in light of more recent studies casting doubt on marihuana as a potential source of birth defects. However, given the immense importance of potential birth defects for all concerned, and the widely recognized need for further research, we have to accept that on this point as on many others "the jury is still out".

52 The trial judge noted, at para. 46, that the findings of the 1994 Hall Report were similar (except for the leukemia and birth defects concerns) to a report entitled Cannabis: a health perspective and research agenda (1997), published a few years later by the World Health Organization, Division of Mental Health and Prevention of Substance Abuse, which contained the following statement about the "acute health effects", i.e., the effects experienced by users during and for a period following the use of marihuana (at p. 30):

> Acute health effects of cannabis use
>
> The acute effects of cannabis use have been recognized for many years, and recent studies have confirmed and extended earlier findings. These may be summarized as follows:
>
> • cannabis impairs cognitive development (capabilities of learning), including associative processes; free recall of previously learned items is often impaired when cannabis is used both during learning and recall periods;
>
> • cannabis impairs psychomotor performance in a wide variety of tasks, such as motor coordination, divided attention, and operative tasks of many types; human performance on complex machinery can be impaired for as long as 24 hours after smoking as little as 20mg of THC in cannabis; there is an increased risk of motor vehicle accidents among persons who drive when intoxicated by cannabis.

53 The chronic and therapeutic effects of marihuana use were also listed by the World Health Organization and are set out in the Appendix.

4. Parliamentary Reports

54 Our attention was drawn by the parties to a number of parliamentary reports issued since the decision of the courts below, of which we may and do take judicial notice.

55 In September 2002, the Senate Special Committee on Illegal Drugs concluded that "the state of knowledge supports the belief that, for the vast majority of recreational users, cannabis use presents no harmful consequences for physical, psychological or social well-being in either the short or the long term" (vol. I, at p. 165).

56 At the same time, the Senate Committee acknowledged potential harm to a minority of users, including the vulnerable groups identified by the Hall Report and reported by the trial judge (vol. I, at pp. 166-67):

> The Committee feels that, because of its potential effects on the endogenous cannabinoid system and cognitive and psychosocial functions, any use in those under age 16 is at-risk use;
>
> Our estimation would suggest that approximately 50,000 youths fall in this category.
>
> . . . . .
>
> Heavy use of smoked cannabis can have certain negative consequences for physical health, in particular for the respiratory system (chronic bronchitis, cancer of the upper respiratory tract).
>
> Heavy use of cannabis can result in negative psychological consequences for users, in particular impaired concentration and learning and, in rare cases and with people already predisposed, psychotic and schizophrenic episodes.
>
> Heavy use of cannabis can result in consequences for a user's social well-being, in particular their occupational and social situation and their ability to perform tasks.
>
> Heavy use of cannabis can result in dependence requiring treatment; however, dependence caused by cannabis is less severe and less frequent tha[n] dependence on other psychotropic substances, including alcohol and tobacco.

57 Echoing many other studies and reports, the Senate Committee underlined the need for further research, e.g., with respect to the potential impact of marihuana use on some psychiatric disorders (vol. I, at p. 151):

> As it is, most scientific reports come to the same conclusion: more research is needed, with more rigorous protocols, allowing in particular for comparison with other populations and other substances.

58 In December 2002, the House of Commons Special Committee on Non-Medical Use of Drugs reported on the therapeutic benefits and potential adverse effects to some users of marihuana, and recommended that possession of marihuana be dealt with by a scheme of "ticketing, except where the offence is committed in the presence of specified aggravating circumstances", such as impaired driving (Policy for the New Millennium: Working Together to Redefine Canada's Drug Strategy (2002), at p. 130).

59 On May 27, 2003, the Minister of Justice introduced Bill C-38 which would eliminate the potential of imprisonment following a conviction for possession of no more than 15 grams of marihuana.

60 The Senate and House of Commons Committee Reports are consistent with the conclusions reached by the courts in British Columbia that, while marihuana is not a "harmless" drug, nevertheless the degree and extent of harm associated with its use is subject to continuing controversy, as is the wisdom of the present legislative scheme.

61 We have been shown no reason to interfere with these findings of fact. It seems clear that the use of marihuana has less serious and permanent effects than was once claimed, but its psychoactive and health effects can be harmful, and in the case of members of vulnerable groups the harm may be serious and substantial.

62 We turn, now, to the legal arguments raised by the parties.

D. Division of Powers

63 The appellant Caine contends that Parliament has no power to criminalize the possession of marihuana for personal use under either the residuary power of peace, order and good government ("POGG") or the criminal law power.

1. The Purpose of the NCA

64 The appellant Caine further argues that the Crown is resorting impermissibly to a "shifting purpose" in its effort to salvage the marihuana prohibition. He contends that the legislative origins of the prohibition on cannabis had nothing to do with legitimate claims that cannabis was injurious to public health but was based on racism against oriental drug users and irrational, unproven and unfounded fears. In light of changed thinking and greater knowledge, the alleged legislative facts underlying this original purpose have been refuted. The prohibition has thus ceased to be intra vires. As pointed out in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 (S.C.C.), at p. 335:

> Purpose is a function of the intent of those who drafted and enacted the legislation at the time, and not of any shifting variable.

65 We need not review the law on this point because the argument was rejected on the facts by Braidwood J.A., who reviewed the legislative history in detail and concluded that the prohibition on simple possession of marihuana always "had more than one rationale. It was always meant to prevent the harm to society caused by drug addiction, such as the petty thefts that occur to raise funds to buy drugs" (para. 96). The post-1954 laws further evolved this general purpose with a larger plan to treat and "cure" drug addicts to eliminate the "market" for drug traffickers in Canada. We accept this analysis. Thus, although there was no explanation given during the parliamentary debates as to why cannabis (marihuana) was added to the NCA in 1923, the evidence supports the conclusion of Braidwood J.A. that a major purpose of the prohibition has been, since its enactment and continued thereafter, to be to protect health and public safety. This purpose did not change when the treatment provisions were added to the NCA in 1961. The purpose and character of the legislation remained the same, but new means were added to advance the original objectives of health and public safety. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that the Crown's argument is flawed by reliance on an impermissibly "shifting" purpose.

2. Legislative Jurisdiction with Respect to Narcotics

66 We turn next to the issue as to whether the NCA falls under Parliament's residuary jurisdiction for POGG, or whether it is an exercise of the criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, or whether, as the appellants contend, it falls within neither head of federal jurisdiction and is ultra vires.

(a) Peace, Order and Good Government

67 Almost 25 years ago, a majority of this Court upheld the constitutional validity of the NCA under Parliament's residual authority to legislate for POGG: R. v. Hauser, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 984 (S.C.C.). Pigeon J., for the majority, took the view that the NCA "is essentially legislation adopted to deal with a genuinely new problem which did not exist at the time of Confederation and clearly cannot be put in the class of 'Matters of a merely local or private nature'" (p. 1000). Accordingly, Pigeon J. reasoned, the subject matter of the NCA is similar to other new developments such as aviation and radio communication. Dickson J., as he then was, dissented on this point, finding that the NCA should be considered as a matter of federal criminal power, relying on the Court's earlier decision in R. v. Industrial Acceptance Corp., [1953] 2 S.C.R. 273 (S.C.C.), which had upheld the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929, S.C. 1929, c. 49, under the federal criminal power.

68 The dissenting judgment of Dickson J. in Hauser focussed in part on whether the federal Crown had the authority to prosecute crimes (see, e.g., p. 1011). Some commentators have speculated that the Court strained to locate the law within the POGG power because the Court was deeply divided on this issue: see, e.g., P.W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (2002 student ed.), at p. 438. To the extent that such considerations were a factor in the thinking of the majority, the authority of the federal Attorney General to prosecute offences created under the criminal law power has since been affirmed in Canadian National Transportation Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 206 (S.C.C.) (federal power to prosecute crimes under the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, ss. 15(2) and 32(1)(c)), and R. v. Kripps Pharmacy Ltd., [1983] 2

S.C.R. 284 (S.C.C.) (federal power to prosecute under Food and Drugs Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-27, ss. 8, 9, 26). See also R. v. S. (S.), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 254 (S.C.C.), at p. 283 (Parliament has jurisdiction to delegate powers to provincial officials to prosecute offences under the Young Offenders Act, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 110, s. 4).

69 In Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General) (1979), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914 (S.C.C.), at pp. 944-45, the Court outlined three instances in which the federal residual power applies:

> (i) the existence of a national emergency;
>
> (ii) with respect to a subject matter which did not exist at the time of Confederation and is clearly not in a class of matters of a merely local or private nature;
> (iii) where the subject matter "goes beyond local or provincial concern and must, from its inherent nature, be the concern of the Dominion as a whole".

70 It is not contended that the use of marihuana rises to the level of a national emergency. As to the second category, if, as we conclude infra, the NCA is a valid exercise of the criminal law power, it would not be consistent with that conclusion to uphold it under the branch of POGG that deals with "new" legislative subject matter not otherwise allocated. To that extent we disagree with the view taken by the majority in Hauser, supra.

71 These observations leave only the third category as a potential source of authority under POGG. The Attorney General of Canada contends that the control of narcotics is a legislative subject matter that "goes beyond local or provincial concern and must, from its inherent nature, be the concern of the Dominion as a whole". He puts his position as follows:

> The importation, manufacture, distribution, and use of psychoactive substances are matters having an impact on the country as a whole, and which can only be dealt with on an integrated national basis. Additionally, the international aspects are such that these matters cannot be effectively addressed at the local level.

72 We do not exclude the possibility that the NCA might be justifiable under the "national concern" branch on the rationale adopted in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401 (S.C.C.), at p. 432, where we held that concerted action amongst provincial and federal entities, each acting within their respective spheres of legislative jurisdiction, was essential to deal with Canada's international obligations regarding the environment. In our view, however, the Court should decline in this case to revisit Parliament's residual authority to deal with drugs in general (or marihuana in particular) under the POGG power. If, as is presently one of the options under consideration, Parliament removes marihuana entirely from the criminal law framework, Parliament's continuing legislative authority to deal with marihuana use on a purely regulatory basis might well be questioned. The Court would undoubtedly have more ample legislative facts and submissions in such a case than we have in this appeal. Our conclusion that the present prohibition against the use of marihuana can be supported under the criminal law power makes it unnecessary to deal with the Attorney General's alternative position under the POGG power, and we leave this question open for another day.

(b) The Criminal Law Power

73 The federal criminal law power is "plenary in nature" and has been broadly construed:

> A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened. (Reference re Validity of s. 5(a) of Dairy Industry Act (Canada), (Margarine Case), [1949] S.C.R. 1 (S.C.C.) (the "Margarine Reference"), at p. 49)

In the present case the "evil or injurious or undesirable effect" is the harm attributed to the non-medical use of marihuana.

74 For a law to be classified as a criminal law, it must possess three prerequisites: a valid criminal law purpose backed by a prohibition and a penalty: Reference re Firearms Act (Canada), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783, 2000 SCC 31 (S.C.C.), at para. 27. The criminal power extends to those laws that are designed to promote public peace, safety, order, health or other legitimate public purpose. In RJR-Macdonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199 (S.C.C.), it was held that some legitimate public purpose must underlie the prohibition. In Labatt Breweries, supra, in holding that a health hazard may ground a criminal prohibition, Estey J. stated the potential purposes of the criminal law rather broadly as including "public peace, order, security, health and morality" (p. 933). Of course Parliament cannot use its authority improperly, e.g. colourably, to invade areas of provincial competence: Scowby v. Saskatchewan (Board of Inquiry), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 226 (S.C.C.), at p. 237.

75 In various instances members of this Court have upheld the constitutionality of the NCA on the basis of the criminal power: Industrial Acceptance Corp., supra, Hauser, supra Dickson J., dissenting on this point, at p. 1060; and Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, per Laskin C.J., at p. 115. Other courts interpreting the Opium Act and its successors have also reached this conclusion. See, e.g., R. v. Dufresne (1912), 5 D.L.R. 501, and R. v. Wakabayashi, [1928] 3 D.L.R. 226 (B.C. S.C.).

76 The purpose of the NCA fits within the criminal law power, which includes the protection of vulnerable groups: Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.), at p. 595. See also R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (S.C.C.), at pp. 74-75, in which s. 251 of the Criminal Code prohibiting abortions except in therapeutic situations was held to have a valid objective, namely protecting the life and health of pregnant women, although it failed the s. 1 test on other grounds. On somewhat related issues arising under the Charter, the protection of vulnerable groups has also been upheld under s. 1 as a valid federal objective of the exercise of the criminal law power. In R. v. Sharpe, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, 2001 SCC 2 (S.C.C.), we upheld s. 163.1(4) of the Criminal Code prohibiting the possession of child pornography, noting that the prevention of harm threatening vulnerable members of society is a valid limit on freedom of expression. Similarly in R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452 (S.C.C.), at p. 497, we concluded that "legislation proscribing obscenity is a valid objective which justifies some encroachment on the right to freedom of expression". In so doing, we emphasized the impact of the exploitation of women and children, depicted in publications and films, which can in certain circumstances, lead to "abject and servile victimization". In R. v. Keegstra, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 381 (S.C.C.), we held that the restrictions on free speech imposed by the hate speech provision in the Criminal Code was a justifiable limit under s. 1 because of potential attacks on minorities.

77 The protection of vulnerable groups from self-inflicted harms does not, as Caine argues, amount to no more than "legal moralism". Morality has traditionally been identified as a legitimate concern of the criminal law (Labatt Breweries, supra, at p. 933) although today this does not include mere "conventional standards of propriety" but must be understood as referring to societal values beyond the simply prurient or prudish: Butler, supra, at p. 498; R. v. Murdock (2003), 11 C.R. (6th) 43 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 32. The protection of the chronic users identified by the trial judge, and adolescents who may not yet have become chronic users, but who have the potential to do so, is a valid criminal law objective. In Canada (Procureure générale) c. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213 (S.C.C.), the Court held at para. 131 that "Parliament has for long exercised extensive control over such matters as food and drugs by prohibitions grounded in the criminal law power". See also Berryland Canning Co. v. R., [1974] 1 F.C. 91 (Fed. T.D.), at pp. 94-95; Standard Sausage Co. v. Lee (1934), 61 C.C.C. 95 (B.C. C.A.), supplemented by addendum at (1934), 61 C.C.C. 95 (B.C. C.A.). In our view, the control of a "psychoactive drug" that "causes alteration of mental function" clearly raises issues of public health and safety, both for the user as well as for those in the broader society affected by his or her conduct.

78 The use of marihuana is therefore a proper subject matter for the exercise of the criminal law power. *Butler*held, at p. 504, that if there is a reasoned apprehension of harm Parliament is entitled to act, and in our view Parliament is also entitled to act on reasoned apprehension of harm even if on some points "the jury is still out". In light of the concurrent findings of "harm" in the courts below, we therefore confirm that the NCA in general, and the scheduling of marihuana in particular, properly fall within Parliament's legislative competence under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

79 Prior to the enactment of the Charter in 1982, that finding, which validates the exercise of the criminal law power, would have ended the appellants' challenge. Now, of course, Parliament must not only find legislative authority within the Constitution Act, 1867, but it must exercise that authority subject to the individual rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter.

80 We therefore turn to the appellants' Charter arguments.

E. Section 7 of the Charter

81 The appellant Malmo-Levine argues that smoking marihuana is integral to his preferred lifestyle, and that the criminalization of marihuana in both its possession and trafficking aspects is an unacceptable infringement of his personal liberty.

82 The appellant Caine, on the other hand, takes aim at the potential for imprisonment for conviction of possession of marihuana, and argues that imprisonment for such an offence is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If the penalty falls, he says, the substantive offence must fall with it.

83 These "liberty" interests are, of course, very different. We propose therefore first to identify the s. 7 "interest" properly at stake, then secondly to discuss the applicable principles of fundamental justice. Thirdly we will examine whether the deprivation of the s. 7 interest thus identified is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice relevant to these appeals. As will be seen, we find no s. 7 infringement. It will therefore not be necessary to move to s. 1 to determine if an infringement would be justified in a free and democratic society.

1. The Interests at Stake

84 We say at once that the availability of imprisonment for the offence of simple possession is sufficient to trigger s. 7 scrutiny: Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.). However, Malmo-Levine's position (which is supported by the intervener British Columbia Civil Liberties Association) requires us to address whether broader considerations of personal autonomy, short of imprisonment, are also sufficient to invoke s. 7 protection. The appellant Caine, whose factum talks of the "fun" or "social" use of cannabis, writes, at para. 30:

> It is submitted that a decision whether or not to possess and consume Cannabis (marijuana), even if potentially harmful to the user, is analogous to the decision by an individual as to what food to eat or not eat and whether or not to eat fatty foods, and as such is a decision of fundamental personal importance involving a choice made by the individual involving that individual's personal autonomy.

85 In Morgentaler, supra, Wilson J. suggested that liberty "grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance", "without interference from the state" (p. 166). Liberty accordingly means more than freedom from physical restraint. It includes "the right to an irreducible sphere of personal autonomy wherein individuals may make inherently private choices free from state interference": Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844 (S.C.C.), at para. 66; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto (1994), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315 (S.C.C.), at para. 80. This is true only to the extent that such matters "can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence": Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844 (S.C.C.), at para. 66. See also Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, 2000 SCC 44 (S.C.C.), at para. 54; Buhlers v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles) (1999), 170 D.L.R. (4th) 344 (B.C. C.A.), at para. 109; Horsefield v. Ontario (Registrar of Motor Vehicles) (1999), 44 O.R. (3d) 73 (Ont. C.A.).

86 While we accept Malmo-Levine's statement that smoking marihuana is central to his lifestyle, the Constitution cannot be stretched to afford protection to whatever activity an individual chooses to define as central to his or her lifestyle. One individual chooses to smoke marihuana; another has an obsessive interest in golf; a third is addicted to gambling. The appellant Caine invokes a taste for fatty foods. A society that extended constitutional protection to any and all such lifestyles would be ungovernable. Lifestyle choices of this order are not, we think, "basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence" (Godbout, supra, at para. 66).

87 In our view, with respect, Malmo-Levine's desire to build a lifestyle around the recreational use of marihuana does not attract Charter protection. There is no free-standing constitutional right to smoke "pot" for recreational purposes.

88 The appellants also invoke their s. 7 interest in "security of the person". In Morgentaler, supra, Dickson C.J. accepted that "serious state-imposed psychological stress" (p. 56 (emphasis added)) would suffice to infringe this interest. The appellants, however, contend that use of marihuana is non-addictive. Prohibition would not therefore lead to a level of stress that is constitutionally cognizable. A very different issue would arise if the marihuana was required for medical purposes, but neither appellant uses marihuana for such a purpose.

89 The availability of imprisonment is a different matter. We have no doubt that the risk of being sent to jail engages the appellants' liberty interest. Accordingly, it is necessary to move to the next stage of the s. 7 analysis to determine what are the relevant principles of fundamental justice and whether this risk of deprivation of liberty is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

2. Principles of Fundamental Justice

90 The appellants accept that Parliament may act to avoid harm to others without violating principles of fundamental justice. They focus on the alleged absence of such harm, and contend that it is a denial of fundamental justice to deprive them of their liberty where such denial does not enhance a legitimate interest of the state. To hold otherwise, they say, would require the courts to endorse the arbitrary or irrational use of the criminal law power, contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. As Sopinka J. stated in Rodriguez, supra, at p. 594:

> Where the deprivation of the right in question does little or nothing to enhance the state's interest (whatever it may be), it seems to me that a breach of fundamental justice will be made out, as the individual's rights will have been deprived for no valid purpose.

91 The appellants' s. 7 arguments have several branches predicated on the requirement of harm. First, they argue that the only permissible target of the criminal law is harm to others; in their view, the criminal law cannot prohibit conduct that harms only the accused. Second, they argue that, in any event, marihuana is not a harmful substance, so that the prohibition of simple possession is arbitrary or irrational. Third, they argue that the criminalization of cannabis possession has adverse consequences, both for those users who are charged and convicted and, because of the disrespect engendered by the law, for the administration of justice generally, that are wholly disproportionate to the societal interests sought to be served by the prohibition. Finally, they submit that the criminalization of cannabis possession is discriminatory and unfair, in light of Parliament's failure to criminalize the possession and use of alcohol and tobacco.

92 The appellant Malmo-Levine further submits that any harm-based analysis should focus on the healthy user who engages in harm-reduction strategies. He argues that the Court of Appeal erred "when they characterized the harms that may come with cannabis use as inherent, instead of a product of mis-cultivation, mis-distribution and mis-use" (Malmo-Levine's factum, at para. 2).

93 We will deal first with a number of preliminary points raised by the appellants.

(a) The Propriety of Balancing Societal and Individual Interests in Section 7

94 The appellant Caine submits that the British Columbia Court of Appeal erred in importing into s. 7 a number of societal interests that have nothing to do with the "principles of fundamental justice" but that he says should be considered, if at all, under a s. 1 justification. In other words, he argues that societal interests are not relevant to defining the right granted under s. 7 but only to determining whether a limit on that right is a reasonable one prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

95 Braidwood J.A. considered that "the operative principle of fundamental justice" in these cases is the harm principle (see para. 159). However, having concluded that the prohibition against simple possession complies with the harm principle, he went on to consider a second question — "whether the NCA strikes the 'right balance' between the rights of the individual and the interests of the State" (para. 160). As authority for this approach, reference was made to Cunningham v. Canada, [1993] 2

S.C.R. 143 (S.C.C.), Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation & Research), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425 (S.C.C.), at p. 539, per La Forest J.; and Rodriguez, supra, at pp. 592-93, per Sopinka J. Prowse J.A., in dissent, engaged in a similar balancing exercise.

96 We do not think that these authorities should be taken as suggesting that courts engage in a freestanding inquiry under s. 7 into whether a particular legislative measure "strikes the right balance" between individual and societal interests in general, or that achieving the right balance is itself an overarching principle of fundamental justice. Such a general undertaking to balance individual and societal interests, independent of any identified principle of fundamental justice, would entirely collapse the s. 1 inquiry into s. 7. The procedural implications of such a collapse are significant. Counsel for the appellant Caine, for example, urges that the appellants having identified a threat to the liberty or security of the person, the evidentiary onus should switch at once to the Crown within s. 7 "to provide evidence of the significant harm that it relies upon to justify the use of criminal sanctions" (Caine's factum, at para. 24).

97 We do not agree. In R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668 (S.C.C.), a majority of this Court pointed out that, despite certain similarities between the balancing of interests in ss. 7 and 1, there are important differences. Firstly, the issue under s. 7 is the delineation of the boundaries of the rights and principles in question whereas under s. 1 the question is whether an infringement may be justified (para. 66). Secondly, it was affirmed that under s. 7 it is the claimant who bears the onus of proof throughout. It is only if an infringement of s. 7 is established that the onus switches to the Crown to justify the infringement under s. 1. Thirdly, the range of interests to be taken into account under s. 1 is much broader than those relevant to s. 7. The Court said in Mills, at para. 67:

> Because of these differences, the nature of the issues and interests to be balanced is not the same under the two sections. As Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at p. 503: "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system". In contrast, s. 1 is concerned with the values underlying a free and democratic society, which are broader in nature. In R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 (S.C.C.), Dickson C.J. stated, at p. 136, that these values and principles "embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society". In R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697 (S.C.C.), at p. 737, Dickson C.J. described such values and principles as "numerous, covering the guarantees enumerated in the Charter and more".

98 The balancing of individual and societal interests within s. 7 is only relevant when elucidating a particular principle of fundamental justice. As Sopinka J. explained in Rodriguez, supra, "in arriving at these principles [of fundamental justice], a balancing of the interest of the state and the individual is required" (pp. 592-93 (emphasis added)). Once the principle of fundamental justice has been elucidated, however, it is not within the ambit of s. 7 to bring into account such "societal interests" as health care costs. Those considerations will be looked at, if at all, under s. 1. As Lamer C.J. commented in R. v. Swain, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933 (S.C.C.), at p. 977:

> It is not appropriate for the state to thwart the exercise of the accused's right by attempting to bring societal interests into the principles of fundamental justice and to thereby limit an accused's s. 7 rights. Societal interests are to be dealt with under s. 1 of the Charter, where the Crown has the burden of proving that the impugned law is demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

99 The principles of fundamental justice asserted by the appellants include the contentions that their conduct should only be the subject of criminal sanction to the extent it harms others, that the state cannot infringe their interests in an arbitrary or irrational manner, or impose criminal sanctions that are disproportionate to the importance of the state interest sought to be protected. Implicit in each of these principles is, of course, the recognition that the appellants do not live in isolation but are part of a larger society. The delineation of the principles of fundamental justice must inevitably take into account the social nature of our collective existence. To that limited extent, societal values play a role in the delineation of the boundaries of the rights and principles in question.

(b) Malmo-Levine's "Harm-Reduction" Argument

100 We wish to be clear that we do not accept Malmo-Levine's argument that Parliament should proceed on the assumption that users will use marihuana "responsibly". We accept his point that careful use can mitigate the harmful effects, but it is open to Parliament to proceed on the more reasonable assumption that psychoactive drugs will to some extent be misused. Indeed, the evidence indicates the existence of both use and misuse by chronic users and by vulnerable groups who cause harm to themselves.

(c) Malmo-Levine's Pleasure Principle

101 Malmo-Levine's related argument, that the pleasure of a large number of people should not be curtailed because of (he says) relatively minor harm to a minority, is similarly misplaced under s. 7. Utilitarian arguments that urge a cost-benefit calculation of alleged benefit to the many versus alleged harm to the few, to the extent such arguments are relevant under the Charter, belong in s. 1. The appellants must first of all establish a violation of their s. 7 rights. Only if they are able to do so is the government then required to show that the purported limitation is demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

(d) The "Harm Principle"

102 The appellants contend that unless the state can establish that the use of marihuana is harmful to others, the prohibition against simple possession cannot comply with s. 7. Our colleague Arbour J. accepts this proposition as correct to the extent that "the state resorts to imprisonment" (para. 244). Accordingly, a closer look at the alleged "harm principle" is called for.

103 We should be clear about the direction of the appellants' argument. It is agreed by all parties that the existence of harm, especially harm to others, is a state interest sufficient to ground the exercise of the criminal law power. The appellants' contention, however, is that the absence of demonstrated harm to others deprives Parliament of the power to impose criminal liability. That is what they call the "harm principle".

104 We think it right to state at the outset that we do not agree that the "harm principle" plays the essential role assigned to it by the appellants in testing the criminal law against the requirements of the Charter. Further, with respect to our colleague's focus on the availability (if not the imposition) of imprisonment for the simple possession of marihuana, we think the punishment debate is more appropriately addressed under s. 12 of the Charter ("cruel and unusual treatment or punishment"), rather than under s. 7, although clearly it has implications for both s. 7 and s. 1, as will shortly be discussed.

105 The British Columbia Court of Appeal also dealt with this case on the premise that the harm principle was a controlling principle under s. 7 of the Charter. It is therefore appropriate that we deal with it in some detail.

(i) History and Definition of the Harm Principle

106 What is the "harm principle"? The appellants rely, in particular, on the writings of the liberal theorist, J. S. Mill, who attempted to establish clear boundaries for the permissible intrusion of the state into private life:

> The object of this Essay is to assert one very simple principle, as entitled to govern absolutely the dealings of society with the individual in the way of compulsion and control, whether the means used be physical force in the form of legal penalties, or the moral coercion of public opinion. That principle is, that the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectively, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection. That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilised community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant.... The only part of the conduct of any one, for which he is amenable to society, is that which concerns others. In the part which merely concerns himself, his independence is, of right, absolute. Over himself, over his own body and mind, the individual is sovereign.
>
> [Emphasis added.]

(J. S. Mill, On Liberty and Considerations on Representative Government (1946), at pp. 8-9)

107 Thus Mill's principle has two essential features. First, it rejects paternalism — that is, the prohibition of conduct that harms only the actor. Second, it excludes what could be called "moral harm". Mill was of the view that such moral claims are insufficient to justify use of the criminal law. Rather, he required clear and tangible harm to the rights and interests of others.

108 At the same time, Mill acknowledged an exception to his requirement of harm "to others" for vulnerable groups. He wrote that "this doctrine is meant to apply to human beings in the maturity of their faculties.... Those who are still in a state to require being taken care of by others, must be protected against their own actions as well as against external injury" (p. 9).

109 Mill's statement has the virtues of insight and clarity but he was advocating certain general philosophic principles, not interpreting a constitutional document. Moreover, even his philosophical supporters have tended to agree that justification for state intervention cannot be reduced to a single factor — harm — but is a much more complex matter. One of Mill's most distinguished supporters, Professor H. L. A. Hart, wrote:

> Mill's formulation of the liberal point of view may well be too simple. The grounds for interfering with human liberty are more various than the single criterion of 'harm to others' suggests: cruelty to animals or organizing prostitution for gain do not, as Mill himself saw, fall easily under the description of harm to others. Conversely, even where there is harm to others in the most literal sense, there may well be other principles limiting the extent to which harmful activities should be repressed by law. So there are multiple criteria, not a single criterion, determining when human liberty may be restricted.

(ii) Is the Harm Principle a Principle of Fundamental Justice?

110 The appellants submit that the harm principle is a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7 that operates to place limits on the type of conduct the state may criminalize. This limitation exists independently of the division of powers under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In other words, the appellants contend that there is a double threshold. Even if the Crown is able to establish that the creation of a particular criminal offence is a valid exercise of the criminal law power, there is a second level of constraint on the type of conduct that can be made criminal by virtue of s. 7 of the Charter.

111 We agree that there is a form of "double threshold", in that the Charter imposes requirements that are separate from those imposed by ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, we do not agree with the attempted elevation of the harm principle to a principle of fundamental justice. That is, in our view the harm principle is not the constitutional standard for what conduct may or may not be the subject of the criminal law for the purposes of s. 7.

112 In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, Lamer J. (as he then was) explained that the principles of fundamental justice lie in "the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system" (p. 503). This Court provided further guidance as to what constitutes a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, in Rodriguez, supra, per Sopinka J. (at pp. 590-91 and 607):

> A mere common law rule does not suffice to constitute a principle of fundamental justice, rather, as the term implies, principles upon which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice are required. Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles.

> While the principles of fundamental justice are concerned with more than process, reference must be made to principles which are "fundamental" in the sense that they would have general acceptance among reasonable people.
> [Emphasis added.]

113 The requirement of "general acceptance among reasonable people" enhances the legitimacy of judicial review of state action, and ensures that the values against which state action is measured are not just fundamental "in the eye of the beholder only": Rodriguez, at pp. 607 and 590 (emphasis in original). In short, for a rule or principle to constitute a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, it must be a legal principle about which there is significant societal consensus that it is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate, and it must be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person.

a. Is the Harm Principle a Legal Principle?

114 In our view, the "harm principle" is better characterized as a description of an important state interest rather than a normative "legal" principle. Be that as it may, even if the harm principle could be characterized as a legal principle, we do not think that it meets the other requirements, as explained below.

b. There is No Sufficient Consensus that the Harm Principle is Vital or Fundamental to Our Societal Notion of Criminal Justice

115 Contrary to the appellants' assertion, we do not think there is a consensus that the harm principle is the sole justification for criminal prohibition. There is no doubt that our case law and academic commentary are full of statements about the criminal law being aimed at conduct that "affects the public", or that constitutes "a wrong against the public welfare", or is "injurious to the public", or that "affects the community". No doubt, as stated, the presence of harm to others may justify legislative action under the criminal law power. However, we do not think that the absence of proven harm creates the unqualified barrier to legislative action that the appellants suggest. On the contrary, the state may sometimes be justified in criminalizing conduct that is either not harmful (in the sense contemplated by the harm principle), or that causes harm only to the accused.

116 The appellants cite in aid of their position the observation of Sopinka J., writing for the majority in Butler, supra, that "[t]he objective of maintaining conventional standards of propriety, independently of any harm to society, is no longer justified in light of the values of individual liberty which underlie the Charter" (p. 498). However, Sopinka J. went on to clarify that it is open to Parliament to legislate "on the basis of some fundamental conception of morality for the purposes of safeguarding the values which are integral to a free and democratic society" (p. 493 (emphasis added)).

117 Several instances of crimes that do not cause harm to others are found in the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. Cannibalism is an offence (s. 182) that does not harm another sentient being, but that is nevertheless prohibited on the basis of fundamental social and ethical considerations. Bestiality (s. 160) and cruelty to animals (s. 446) are examples of crimes that rest on their offensiveness to deeply held social values rather than on Mill's "harm principle".

118 A duel fought by consenting adults is an example of a crime where the victim is no less culpable than the perpetrator, and there is no harm that is not consented to, but the prohibition (s. 71 of the Code) is nevertheless integral to our ideas of civilized society. See also R. v. Jobidon, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 714 (S.C.C.). Similarly, in R. v. F. (R.P.) (1996), 105 C.C.C. (3d) 435 (N.S. C.A.), the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal upheld the prohibition of incest under s. 155 of the Criminal Code despite a Charter challenge by five consenting adults. In none of these instances of consenting adults does the criminal law conform to Mill's expression of the harm principle that "[o]ver himself, over his own body and mind, the individual is sovereign", as referenced earlier at para. 106.

119 Various jurists and commentators are said by the appellants to have endorsed the idea that harm is required, but we think that these sources, read in context, do not support the "harm principle" as defined by the appellants.

120 One source relied on by the appellants — the writings of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen — illustrates this point. Reference was made to Stephen's statement that the criminal law > must be confined within narrow limits, and can be applied only to definite overt acts or omissions capable of being distinctly proved, which acts or omissions inflict definite evils, either on specific persons or on the community at large.

(J. F. Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law of England (1883), vol. II, at pp. 78-79)

121 However, Stephen himself was a prominent critic of Mill's harm principle. He believed that "immoral" behaviour can be a proper subject for the criminal law. Clearly, his reference to "evils" inflicted on the community includes the idea of moral harm, which Mill specifically excluded from the scope of his "harm principle". Stephen thus supported a much larger view of the legitimate purposes of the criminal law than is permitted by the appellants' argument.

122 The appellants also rely on a 1982 report by the Law Reform Commission of Canada entitled The Criminal Law in Canadian Society which concludes, at p. 45, that the criminal law "ought to be reserved for reacting to conduct that is seriously harmful". This seems, on its face, to support the harm principle. However, the report goes on to state, at p. 45, that such harm > may be caused or threatened to the collective safety or integrity of society through the infliction of direct damage or the undermining of what the Law Reform Commission terms fundamental or essential values — those values or interests necessary for social life to be carried on, or for the maintenance of the kind of society cherished by Canadians.

>
> [Emphasis added.]

Such a definition of "harm" is clearly contrary to Mill's harm principle as endorsed by the appellants.

c. Nor Is There Any Consensus that the Distinction Between Harm to Others and Harm to Self Is of Controlling Importance

123 Our colleague Arbour J. takes the view that when the state wishes to make imprisonment available as a sanction for criminal conduct, it must be able to show the potential of such conduct to cause harm to others (para. 244). With respect, we do not think there is any such principle anchored in our law. As this Court noted in Rodriguez, supra, attempted suicide was an offence under Canadian criminal law (found in the original Code at s. 238) until its repeal by S.C. 1972, c. 13, s. 16. Sopinka J. emphasized, at p. 597, that > the decriminalization of attempted suicide cannot be said to represent a consensus by Parliament or by Canadians in general that the autonomy interest of those wishing to kill themselves is paramount to the state interest in protecting the life of its citizens.

The offence of attempted suicide was removed from the Criminal Code because Parliament came to prefer other ways of addressing the problem of suicide. In that case, as here, there was an important distinction between constitutional competence, which is for the courts to decide, and the wisdom of a particular measure, which, within its constitutional sphere, is up to Parliament.

124 Putting aside, for the moment, the proper approach to the appropriateness of imprisonment (which, as stated, we think should be addressed under s. 12 rather than s. 7), we do not accept the proposition that there is a general prohibition against the criminalization of harm to self. Canada continues to have paternalistic laws. Requirements that people wear seatbelts and motorcycle helmets are designed to "save people from themselves". There is no consensus that this sort of legislation offends our societal notions of justice. Whether a jail sentence is an appropriate penalty for such an offence is another question. However, the objection in that aspect goes to the validity of an assigned punishment — it does not go to the validity of prohibiting the underlying conduct.

125 A recent discussion policy paper from the Law Commission of Canada entitled What is a Crime? Challenges and Alternatives (2003) highlights the difficulties in distinguishing between harm to others and harm to self. It notes that "in a society that recognizes the interdependency of its citizens, such as universally contributing to healthcare or educational needs, harm to oneself is often borne collectively" (p. 17).

126 In short, there is no consensus that tangible harm to others is a necessary precondition to the creation of a criminal law offence.

d. The Harm Principle Is Not a Manageable Standard Against Which to Measure Deprivation of Life, Liberty or Security of the Person

127 Even those who agree with the "harm principle" as a regulator of the criminal law frequently disagree about what it means and what offences will meet or offend the harm principle. In the absence of any agreed definition of "harm" for this purpose, allegations and counter-allegations of non-trivial harm can be marshalled on every side of virtually every criminal law issue, as one author explains:

> The harm principle is effectively collapsing under the weight of its own success. Claims of harm have become so pervasive that the harm principle has become meaningless: the harm principle no longer serves the function of a critical principle because non-trivial harm arguments permeate the debate. Today, the issue is no longer whether a moral offense causes harm, but rather what type and what amount of harms the challenged conduct causes, and how the harms compare. On those issues, the harm principle is silent.
> (B.E. Harcourt, "The Collapse of the Harm Principle" (1999), 90 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 109, at p. 113)

Professor Harcourt goes on to point out that "[i]t is the hidden normative dimensions ... [that] do the work in the harm principle, not the abstract, simple notion of harm" (p. 185). In other words, the existence of harm (however defined) does no more than open a gateway to the debate; it does not give any precise guidance about its resolution.

128 Harm, as interpreted in the jurisprudence, can take a multitude of forms, including economic, physical and social (e.g., injury and/or offence to fundamental societal values). In the present appeal, for example, the respondents put forward a list of "harms" which they attribute to marihuana use. The appellants put forward a list of "harms" which they attribute to marihuana prohibition. Neither side gives much credence to the "harms" listed by the other. Each claims the "net" result to be in its favour.

129 In the result, we do not believe that the content of the "harm" principle as described by Mill and advocated by the appellants provides a manageable standard under which to review criminal or other laws under s. 7 of the Charter. Parliament, we think, is entitled to act under the criminal law power in the protection of legitimate state interests other than the avoidance of harm to others, subject to Charter limits such as the rules against arbitrariness, irrationality and gross disproportionality, discussed below.

(iii) "Avoidance of Harm" is Nevertheless a Valid State Interest

130 While we do not agree with the courts below that the "harm principle" is a principle of fundamental justice, there is nevertheless a state interest in the avoidance of harm to those subject to its laws which may justify parliamentary action.

131 In other words, avoidance of harm is a "state interest" within the rule against arbitrary or irrational state conduct mentioned in Rodriguez, supra, at p. 594, previously cited, that:

> Where the deprivation of the right in question does little or nothing to enhance the state's interest (whatever it may be), it seems to me that a breach of fundamental justice will be made out, as the individual's rights will have been deprived for no valid purpose.
>
> [Emphasis added.]

132 The conclusion that the state has a particular interest in acting to protect vulnerable groups is also consistent with Charter jurisprudence affirming the state's power to intervene to protect children whose lives are in jeopardy and to promote their well-being: New Brunswick (Minister of Health & Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46 (S.C.C.), at para. 70; B. (R.), supra, at para. 88 (per La Forest J).

133 We do not agree with Prowse J.A. that harm must be shown to the court's satisfaction to be "serious" and "substantial" before Parliament can impose a prohibition. Once it is demonstrated, as it has been here, that the harm is not de minimis, or in the words of Braidwood J.A., the harm is "not [in]significant or trivial", the precise weighing and calculation of the nature and extent of the harm is Parliament's job. Members of Parliament are elected to make these sorts of decisions, and have access to a broader range of information, more points of view, and a more flexible investigative process than courts do. A "serious and substantial" standard of review would involve the courts in micromanagement of Parliament's agenda. The relevant constitutional control is not micromanagement but the general principle that the parliamentary response must not be grossly disproportionate to the state interest sought to be protected, as will be discussed.

134 Having said that, our understanding of the view taken of the facts by the courts below is that while the risk of harm to the great majority of users can be characterized at the lower level of "neither trivial nor insignificant", the risk of harm to members of the vulnerable groups reaches the higher level of "serious and substantial". This distinction simply underlines the difficulties of a court attempting to quantify "harm" beyond a de minimis standard.

(iv) In Light of the State Interest Thus Identified, the Prohibition is Neither Arbitrary nor Irrational

135 A criminal law that is shown to be arbitrary or irrational will infringe s. 7: R. v. Arkell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 695 (S.C.C.), at p. 704; R. c. Hamon (1993), 85 C.C.C. (3d) 490 (Que. C.A.), at p. 492. Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. consider the marihuana prohibition to be disproportionate to the societal problems at issue, and, thus arbitrary. This, we think, puts the threshold of judicial intervention too low. LeBel J. writes that "it cannot be denied that marihuana can cause problems of varying nature and severity to some people or to groups of them" (para. 280). That being the case, we think the Charter allows Parliament a broad, though certainly not unlimited, legislative capacity to respond. Marihuana is a psychoactive drug whose "use causes alteration of mental function" according to the trial judge. This alteration creates a potential harm to others when the user engages in "driving, flying and other activities involving complex machinery". Chronic users may suffer "serious" health problems. Vulnerable groups are at particular risk, including adolescents with a history of poor school performance, pregnant women and persons with pre-existing diseases such as cardiovascular diseases, respiratory diseases, schizophrenia or other drug dependencies. These findings of fact disclose a sufficient state interest to support Parliament's intervention should Parliament decide that it is wise to continue to do so, subject to a constitutional standard of gross dispro-portionality, discussed below.

136 The criminalization of possession is a statement of society's collective disapproval of the use of a psychoactive drug such as marihuana (Morgentaler, supra, at p. 70), and, through Parliament, the continuing view that its use should be deterred. The prohibition is not arbitrary but is rationally connected to a reasonable apprehension of harm. In particular, criminalization seeks to take marihuana out of the hands of users and potential users, so as to prevent the associated harm and to eliminate the market for traffickers. In light of these findings of fact it cannot be said that the prohibition on marihuana possession is arbitrary or irrational, although the wisdom of the prohibition and its related penalties is always open to reconsideration by Parliament itself.

137 It is true that Parliament can and has directly addressed some of the potential harmful conduct elsewhere in the Criminal Code. Section 253, for example, prohibits driving while impaired. One type of legal control to prevent harm does not logically oust other potential forms of legal control, subject as always to the limitation of gross disproportionality discussed below.

138 The appellants also contend that Parliament's failure to criminalize the consumption of alcohol and tobacco, while criminalizing the use of marihuana (which the appellants say is, if anything, less harmful) shows the arbitrariness of the law. It is clear that the consumption of alcohol and tobacco can be harmful. Moreover in some respects the harm is of a type comparable to that caused by marihuana consumption. Much of the bronchial harm associated with marihuana, for instance, comes from the smoking aspect rather than its intoxicating properties.

139 However, if Parliament is otherwise acting within its jurisdiction by enacting a prohibition on the use of marihuana, it does not lose that jurisdiction just because there are other substances whose health and safety effects could arguably justify similar legislative treatment. To hold otherwise would involve the courts in not only defining the outer limits of the legislative action allowed by the Constitution but also in ordering Parliament's priorities within those limits. That is not the role of the courts under our constitutional arrangements.

140 Parliament may, as a matter of constitutional law, determine what is not criminal as well as what is. The choice to use the criminal law in a particular context does not require its use in any other: RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 50. Parliament's decision to move in one area of public health and safety without at the same time moving in other areas is not, on that account alone, arbitrary or irrational.

(v) The Allegation of Disproportionality

141 Having rejected the appellants' contention that Parliament is without authority to criminalize conduct unless it causes harm to others, as well as their claim that criminalization of marihuana is arbitrary and irrational, we proceed to the next level of their argument, namely that even if it is not arbitrary and irrational, criminalization is nevertheless disproportionate to any threat posed by marihuana use.

142 In Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1 (S.C.C.), at para. 47, the Court accepted that the means taken to achieve an objective can be so disproportionate to the desired end so as to offend the principles of fundamental justice:

> Determining whether deportation to torture violates the principles of fundamental justice requires us to balance [under s. 7] Canada's interest in combatting terrorism and the Convention refugee's interest in not being deported to torture. Canada has a legitimate and compelling interest in combatting terrorism. But it is also committed to fundamental justice. The notion of proportionality is fundamental to our constitutional system. Thus we must ask whether the government's proposed response is reasonable in relation to the threat. In the past, we have held that some responses are so extreme that they are per se disproportionate to any legitimate government interest: see Burns, supra. We must ask whether deporting a refugee to torture would be such a response.
>
> [Emphasis added.]

See also United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 2001 SCC 7 (S.C.C.), at para. 78.

143 In short, after it is determined that Parliament acted pursuant to a legitimate state interest, the question can still be posed under s. 7 whether the government's legislative measures in response to the use of marihuana were, in the language of Suresh, "so extreme that they are per se disproportionate to any legitimate government interest" (para. 47 (emphasis added)). As we explain below, the applicable standard is one of gross disproportionality, the proof of which rests on the claimant.

144 The aspect of proportionality of interest to the appellants is the alleged lack of proportionality between the contribution of the marihuana prohibition to public health and safety (the appellants say the prohibition is so ineffective that it contributes little) and the adverse effects on persons subject to the prohibition, including those who are charged and convicted of the offence (the appellants say the adverse effects are severe and lasting). The relevant effects include those that relate to the life, liberty or security of an individual, and that are the product of the state action complained of.

145 We have already rejected Mr. Malmo-Levine's "pleasure principle" on the basis that depriving the general user of the freedom to smoke "pot" is not the violation of a freestanding constitutional right. We turn now to the effects of the criminalization of marihuana possession on accused persons.

3. The Availability of Imprisonment

146 Although this issue belongs to the s. 7 analysis, we wish to highlight its importance here to address our disagreement with Arbour J., for whom the availability of imprisonment is the controlling consideration (paras. 216, 244, 256 and 257).

147 Our colleague writes at para. 257:

> While the cases referred to by my colleagues clearly illustrate the state's interest in the protection of vulnerable groups from others who might harm them, they are far from suggesting that it is the vulnerable ones who should be sent to jail for their self-protection. Implicit in my colleagues' argument is that the state would be justified in threatening with imprisonment adolescents with a history of poor school performance, women of child-bearing age and persons with pre-existing diseases such as cardiovascular diseases, respiratory diseases, schizophrenia and other drug dependencies, who are at particular risk of harming themselves by using marihuana. I do not think that an exception to the harm principle is justified to allow the state to threaten with imprisonment vulnerable people in order to prevent them from harming themselves.

148 We disagree with our colleague's view that it is unconstitutional for the state to attempt to deter vulnerable people from self-harm by criminalization of the harmful conduct backed up, where appropriate, by the "threat" of imprisonment. We disagree with the premise that vulnerable people of the sort she describes are in fact threatened with jail, or that imposition of a jail term in the circumstances she envisages would be upheld as a fit sentence or a constitutional sentence.

149 A finding that a particular form of penalty violates s. 12 may call for a constitutional remedy in relation to the penalty, but leave intact the criminalization of the conduct, which may still be constitutionally punishable by an alternative form of penalty.

150 Braidwood J.A., too, rested his analysis on the availability of imprisonment. He found that "it is common sense that you don't go to jail unless there is a potential that your activities will cause harm to others" (para. 134). The appellant in Clay, supra, released concurrently, similarly argued at para. 25 of his factum that "[w]hile a reasonable apprehension of a 'not insignificant' or 'not trivial' harm may suffice to justify a regulatory prohibition on the personal and private consumption of a substance, it is not constitutionally adequate for justifying the use of incarceration and the imposition of a criminal record to deter such consumption" (emphasis added). We agree with the observation that the operative concept here is the use of incarceration, not the availability of incarceration.

151 In addition to the possible penalty of imprisonment, the appellants highlight a number of other consequences of being charged and convicted for possession of marihuana, including the effects of having a criminal record, the cost of mounting a defence, and the potential adverse impact on education and job prospects (even prior to trial, and whether or not a conviction results). They submit that these harms to the individual accused are disproportionate to any societal interest served by the (largely ineffective) suppression of marihuana use.

152 As the appellants' principal argument on this branch of the case relates to the availability of imprisonment, we will turn first to that issue.

(a) No Mandatory Minimum Sentence

153 Possession of marihuana carries no minimum sentence. However, the general framework of the NCA permits imprisonment, and marihuana is one of the scheduled drugs. The prescription of sentencing options by Parliament reflects its view of the seriousness of the offence, and is ordinarily taken into consideration by the sentencing judge.

154 Imprisonment is imposed by the courts for simple possession only in exceptional circumstances. Our colleague Arbour J. writes, as mentioned earlier, about threatening with jail underachieving school age adolescents, women of childbearing age and the mentally afflicted, but the cases show that this analysis rests on a faulty premise. In most possession cases, offenders (whether vulnerable or not) receive discharges or conditional sentences. This is particularly true where the amounts of marihuana involved are small and for recreational uses, where the usual sentence is a conditional discharge. See, e.g., C.C. Ruby and D.L. Martin, Criminal Sentencing Digest (loose-leaf), 30§320, at p. 1251; R. v. Fleming (1992), 21 W.A.C. 79 (B.C. C.A.); R. v. Culley (1977), 36 C.C.C. (2d) 433 (Ont. C.A.).

155 The reality is this. There is no impediment (such as a mandatory minimum sentence) to a trial judge imposing a fit sentence after a conviction for simple possession of marihuana. The "availability" of imprisonment in respect of the scheduled drugs under the NCA is part of a statutory framework for dealing with drugs generally and is not specifically directed at marihuana. The case law discloses that it is only in the presence of aggravating circumstances, not likely to be present in the situation of the "vulnerable persons" referred to by our colleague, where a court has been persuaded that imprisonment for simple possession of marihuana was, in the particular case, a fit sentence.

156 In R. v. Dauphinee (1984), 62 N.S.R. (2d) 156 (S.C. App. Div.), a three-month sentence of imprisonment for simple possession of one ounce of marihuana was upheld on appeal because the offender had five prior narcotics possession offences and the trial judge noted that the accused showed no signs of amending his conduct. Prison sentences are also occasionally handed out where an individual has been sentenced for a more serious drug offence. See, e.g., R. v. Witter, [1997] O.J. No. 2248 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (six-month sentence for possession of marihuana to be served concurrently with three-year sentence for trafficking in cocaine; accused had nine prior narcotics convictions); R. v. Coady (1994), 24 W.C.B. (2d) 459 (Nfld. T.D.) (sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment for possession of 70 grams of marihuana to be served concurrently with nine-month sentence for possession of hashish with intent to traffic); R. v. Richards (1989), 88 N.S.R. (2d) 245 (N.S. C.A.) (four-month sentence for possession of 113.5 grams of marihuana to be served concurrently with a sentence of one year for possession of 15 grams of cocaine, plus one year's probation; respondent had six prior narcotics-related convictions; the court noted his behaviour endangered the safety of his family and no leniency was warranted in light of his recidivism). In addition, some incarcerations associated with possession offences result from the failure to pay fines, or where the Crown has agreed to permit a plea bargain for a lesser included offence. See B. A. MacFarlane, R. J. Frater and C. Proulx, Drug Offences in Canada (3rd ed. (loose-leaf)), at p. 29-20.

157 It is no doubt true that in an earlier era judges may have resorted to imprisonment more frequently than would be considered acceptable under the Charter, but the argument here is a post-Charter argument. It asks whether the marihuana prohibition can be — and is required to be — applied consistently with the Charter. In our view, the answer to both questions is yes.

158 First, as mentioned above, we believe that the issue of punishment should be approached in light of s. 12 of the Charter (which protects against "cruel and unusual treatment or punishment"), and, in that regard, the constitutional standard is one of gross disproportionality. Second, in our opinion, the lack of any mandatory minimum sentence together with the existence of well-established sentencing principles mean that the mere availability of imprisonment on a marihuana charge cannot, without more, violate the principle against gross disproportionality.

(b) The Section 12 Standard — Gross Disproportionality

159 The standard set out in s. 12 of the Charter sheds light on the requirements of s. 7. As Lamer J. explained in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter may be seen as specific illustrations of the principles of fundamental justice in s. 7. While proportionality "is the essence of a s. 12 analysis", R. v. Morrisey, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 90, 2000 SCC 39 (S.C.C.), the constitutional standard is gross disproportionality. As the majority explained in Morrisey (at para. 26):

> Where a punishment is merely disproportionate, no remedy can be found under s. 12. Rather, the court must be satisfied that the punishment imposed is grossly disproportionate for the offender, such that Canadians would find the punishment abhorrent or intolerable. [First emphasis added; second emphasis in original.]

See R. v. Smith, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1045 (S.C.C.), per Lamer J., as he then was, at p. 1072:

> The test for review under s. 12 of the Charter is one of gross disproportionality, because it is aimed at punishments that are more than merely excessive. We should be careful not to stigmatize every disproportionate or excessive sentence as being a constitutional violation, and should leave to the usual sentencing appeal process the task of reviewing the fitness of a sentence. [Emphasis added.]

See also Steele v. Mountain Institution, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1385 (S.C.C.), at p. 1417: "The test for determining whether a sentence is disproportionately long is very properly stringent and demanding. A lesser test would tend to trivialize the Charter". See also R. v. Latimer, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2001 SCC 1 (S.C.C.), at para. 77.

160 Is there then a principle of fundamental justice embedded in s. 7 that would give rise to a constitutional remedy against a punishment that does not infringe s. 12? We do not think so. To find that gross and excessive disproportionality of punishment is required under s. 12 but a lesser degree of proportionality suffices under s. 7 would render incoherent the scheme of interconnected "legal rights" set out in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter by attributing contradictory standards to ss. 12 and 7 in relation to the same subject matter. Such a result, in our view, would be unacceptable.

161 Accordingly, even if we were persuaded by our colleague Arbour J. that punishment should be considered under s. 7 instead of s. 12, the result would remain the same. In both cases, the constitutional standard is gross disproportionality. In neither case is the standard met.

162 Further, even if the penalty of imprisonment were found to violate the gross disproportionality standard, the constitutional remedy would have to address the range of available penalties rather than the decriminalization of the underlying conduct of marihuana possession.

(c) Proportionality in Sentencing

163 At this point, we turn from the Charter to the Criminal Code, in which Parliament has made the idea of proportionality central to the principles of sentencing. Section 718.1 of the Criminal Code provides that "[a] sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender." The importance of proportionality in punishment has been discussed on several occasions by this Court. See, for instance, R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5 (S.C.C.) fundamental principle of sentencing, which provides that a sentence must be proportional to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender". See also R. v. W. (L.W.), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 455, 2000 SCC 18 (S.C.C.), at para. 18; R. v. M. (C.A.), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 500 (S.C.C.), at para. 40; and Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, per Wilson J. (concurring), at p. 533.

164 The requirement of proportionality in sentencing undermines rather than advances the appellants' argument. There is no need to turn to the Charter for relief against an unfit sentence. If imprisonment is not a fit sentence in a particular case it will not be imposed, and if imposed, it will be reversed on appeal.

165 There is no plausible threat, express or implied, to imprison accused persons — including vulnerable ones — for whom imprisonment is not a fit sentence.

166 On another branch of the imprisonment argument, our colleague Arbour J. argues that it is unconstitutional for the state to attempt to prevent the general population, under threat of imprisonment, from engaging in conduct that is harmless to them, on the basis that other, more vulnerable persons may harm themselves if they engage in it (para. 258). In our view, with respect, this proposition is too broadly stated. In the present context, as previously noted, the evidence shows that it is not possible generally to distinguish in advance the general population from its more vulnerable members. Chronic users emerge from unexpected sources. If our colleague is correct, the impossibility of precise identification of "chronic users" in advance would incapacitate Parliament from taking any action at all to help those in need of its protection, a proposition we do not accept. Further, we do not agree with our colleague that it is a straightforward matter to distinguish between harm to self and harm to others. We noted earlier the recent comment of the Law Commission of Canada that "in a society that recognizes the interdependency of its citizens, such as universally contributing to healthcare or educational needs, harm to oneself is often borne collectively" (p. 17).

167 We agree with the appellants that imprisonment would ordinarily be an unfit sentence for a conviction on simple possession of marihuana. We disagree, however, that this observation gives rise to a finding of unconstitutionality. Rather, it gives rise, in appropriate circumstances, to an ordinary sentence appeal.

168 In the result, where there is no minimum mandatory sentence, the mere availability of imprisonment on a charge of marihuana possession does not violate the s. 7 principle against gross disproportionality. There are circumstances, as noted, where imprisonment would constitute a fit sentence.

4. A More General Principle of Disproportionality

169 As stated, the proportionality argument made by the appellants is broader than the mere disproportionality of penalty. They are correct to point out that interaction by an accused with the criminal justice system brings with it a number of consequences, not least among them the possibility of a criminal record. We agree that the proportionality principle of fundamental justice recognized in Burns and Suresh is not exhausted by its manifestation in s. 12. The content of s. 7 is not limited to the sum of ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter. See, for instance, R. v. Hebert, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 151 (S.C.C.); Thomson Newspapers, supra. We thus accept that the principle against gross disproportionality under s. 7 is broader than the requirements of s. 12 and is not limited to a consideration of the penalty attaching to conviction. Nevertheless the standard under s. 7, as under s. 12, remains one of gross disproportionality. In other words, if the use of the criminal law were shown by the appellants to be grossly disproportionate in its effects on accused persons, when considered in light of the objective of protecting them from the harm caused by marihuana use, the prohibition would be contrary to fundamental justice and s. 7 of the Charter.

170 In this respect, the appellants urge three factors. Firstly, they point to the adverse consequences to the individual accused other than imprisonment. Secondly, they suggest that the relative ineffectiveness of the ban shows that the prohibition only marginally advances the interest of the state, and that this should facilitate a judicial finding of gross disproportionality. Thirdly, and more generally, the appellants state that the salutary effects of the law are vastly outweighed by the deleterious effects.

171 We address these three aspects of the appellants' disproportionality argument in turn.

(a) The Consequences to the Individual Other Than Imprisonment

172 In addition to the possibility of imprisonment, the appellants refer to harms flowing from having a criminal record. At para. 26 of their Joint Statement of Legislative Facts, they state:

> The impact of criminal convictions on the futures of young Canadians has historically been identified as one of the most serious social harms generated by the criminal prohibition of cannabis. Upon being charged, tremendous costs are incurred during the pre-trial period, costs which tend to have a much more dramatic impact on young people. Most of the young people charged with cannabis offences are on the low end of the socio-economic scale and, thus, for them the financial burden is particularly onerous. Once a person is found guilty of a cannabis charge, s/he must confront the additional adverse effects associated with having a criminal record for such an offence.

There is no doubt that having a criminal record has serious consequences. The legislative policy embodied in the NCA is that a conviction for the possession of marihuana should have serious consequences. Therein lies the deterrent effect of the prohibition. The wisdom of this policy is, as mentioned, under review by Parliament. It appears that this review has been prompted, in part, by a recognition of the significant effects of being involved in the criminal justice system. For instance, background information from Health Canada states:

> [B]eing prosecuted and convicted in a criminal court bears a stigma that can have far-reaching consequences in an individual's life in such areas as job choices, travel and education. Participating in the criminal court process can also involve personal upheaval.

(Health Canada, "Information: Cannabis Reform Bill", May 2003)

173 However, the question before us is not whether Parliament should change its policy but whether it is required by the Constitution to do so. As Dickson C.J. commented in Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123 (S.C.C.), at p. 1142: "The issue is not whether the legislative scheme is frustrating or unwise but whether the scheme offends the basic tenets of our legal system".

174 On this branch of the case the Court can only ask whether the effects on the accused are so grossly disproportionate that they render the prohibition contrary to s. 7 of the Charter. Once it is determined that Parliament acted pursuant to a valid state interest in attempting to suppress the use for recreational purposes of a particular psychoactive drug, and given the findings of harm flowing from marihuana use, already discussed, we do not think that the consequences in this case trigger a finding of gross disproportionality. Firstly, the consequences are largely the product of deliberate disobedience to the law of the land. In his factum, Malmo-Levine speaks of "mass civil disobedience". He writes (at para. 10):

> The glaring hypocrisy of the war on "some" drugs, and the obvious effectiveness of cannabis will ensure users are never going to back down, and that we intend to outgrow the "low-functioning" stigma foisted upon us and assume our rightful place as the "mellow and imaginative" section of society.

This may be so, but evaluation of adverse effects has to take the nature of this political confrontation into account. Secondly, if the court imposes a sentence on conviction that is no more than a fit sentence, which it is required to do, the other adverse consequences are really associated with the criminal justice system in general rather than this offence in particular. In any system of criminal law there will be prosecutions that turn out to be unfounded, publicity that is unfairly adverse, costs associated with a successful defence, lingering and perhaps unfair consequences attached to a conviction for a relatively minor offence by other jurisdictions, and so on. These effects are serious but they are part of the social and individual costs of having a criminal justice system. Whenever Parliament exercises its criminal law power, such costs will arise. To suggest that such "inherent" costs are fatal to the exercise of the power is to overshoot the function of s. 7.

175 We agree that the effects on an accused person of the criminalization of marihuana possession are serious. They are the legitimate subject of public controversy. They will undoubtedly be addressed in parliamentary debate. Applying a standard of gross disproportionality however, it is our view that the effects on accused persons of the present law, including the potential of imprisonment, fall within the broad latitude within which the Constitution permits legislative action.

(b) Ineffectiveness of the Prohibition of Marihuana

176 The appellants next argue that the adverse effects on accused persons of the prohibition on possession are grossly disproportionate to any legitimate state interest because the prohibition is simply ineffective. It contributes virtually nothing to advancing the state interest in preventing the use of marihuana. Reliance is placed in this regard on the view of the trial judge in Caine who stated: "Thus, in Canada, it would appear that the variations in consumption rates noted above (in particular, the decline in consumption since 1969) have occurred with no apparent statistical relationship to any increase or decrease in the severity of the law or its application" (para. 57). Also, at para. 62: "It is a fair and common sense conclusion that marihuana consumption would increase upon legalization, thereby leading to an increase in the absolute number of chronic users and vulnerable persons adversely affected by the drug. However, it is impossible to conclude, from the evidence before me, whether this increase would be substantial, moderate, or negligible."

177 This Court has exercised caution in accepting arguments about the alleged ineffectiveness of legal measures: see Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), supra, where the Court held that "[t]he efficacy of a law, or lack thereof, is not relevant to Parliament's ability to enact it under the division of powers analysis" (para. 57). While somewhat different considerations come into play under a Charter analysis, it remains important that some deference be accorded to Parliament in assessing the utility of its chosen responses to perceived social ills.

178 Questions about which types of measures and associated sanctions are best able to deter conduct that Parliament considers undesirable is a matter of legitimate ongoing debate. The so-called "ineffectiveness" is simply another way of characterizing the refusal of people in the appellants' position to comply with the law. It is difficult to see how that refusal can be elevated to a constitutional argument against validity based on the invocation of fundamental principles of justice. Indeed, it would be inconsistent with the rule of law to allow compliance with a criminal prohibition to be determined by each individual's personal discretion and taste.

(c) The Balance of Salutary and Deleterious Effects

179 Finally, the appellants say that the prohibition is disproportionate to the state's interest because its negative consequences are grossly disproportionate to its positive features, if any.

180 In this connection, Braidwood J.A. reproduced a summary of the evidence of harm to society resulting from the prohibition itself including disrespect for the law among those who disagree with it; distrust of health and educational authorities who have "promoted false and exaggerated allegations about marihuana"; lack of communication between youth and their elders about the use of marihuana; risks from involvement with criminals and hard-drug users; lack of governmental control over drug quality; "the creation of a lawless sub-culture"; financial costs associated with enforcing the law; and "the inability to engage in meaningful research into the properties, effects and dangers of the drug, because possession of the drug is unlawful" (para. 28).

181 In effect, the exercise undertaken by Braidwood J.A. was to balance the law's salutary and deleterious effects. In our view, with respect, that is a function that is more properly reserved for s. 1. These are the types of social and economic harms that generally have no place in s. 7.

182 The appellants were correct to criticize the government's attempted wholesale importation of "societal interests" from s. 1 to s. 7 to try to support the constitutional validity of the prohibition. In our view, the appellants should equally be stopped from importing the "salutary/deleterious" effects balance from s. 1 in order to try to justify the opposite conclusion.

183 As, in our view, the appellants have not established an infringement of s. 7, there is no need to call on the government for a s. 1 justification.

F. Section 15 of the Charter

184 The appellant Malmo-Levine makes the additional argument that the criminalization of marihuana constitutes a breach of s. 15 of the Charter. He posits that marihuana users have a "substance orientation" which is a personal characteristic analogous to other s. 15 grounds such as sexual orientation: Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493 (S.C.C.). He further submits that s. 15 is meant to protect individuals who have experienced persecution for activities that are not inherently harmful to society, and in the appellant Malmo-Levine's view, cannabis use is simply "harmless hedonis[m]".

185 A taste for marihuana is not a "personal characteristic" in the sense required to trigger s. 15 protection: Andrews v. Law Society (British Columbia), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143 (S.C.C.). As Malmo-Levine argues elsewhere, it is a lifestyle choice. It bears no analogy with the personal characteristics listed in s. 15, namely race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. It would trivialize this list to say that "pot" smoking is analogous to gender or religion as a "deeply personal characteristic that is either unchangeable or changeable only at unacceptable personal costs": Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513 (S.C.C.), at para. 5; Vriend, supra, at para. 90. Malmo-Levine's equality claim therefore fails at the first hurdle of the requirements set out in Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment & Immigration), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 497 (S.C.C.). The true focus of s. 15 is "to remedy or prevent discrimination against groups subject to stereotyping, historical disadvantage and political and social prejudice in Canadian society": Swain, supra, at p. 992, per Lamer C.J.; and Rodriguez, supra, at p. 616. To uphold Malmo-Levine's argument for recreational choice (or lifestyle protection) on the basis of s. 15 of the Charter would simply be to create a parody of a noble purpose.

VI. Conclusion

186 For these reasons, it is our view that the Charter challenges must fail and that the appeals should be dismissed.

187 The constitutional questions in the Malmo-Levine appeal should therefore be answered as follows:

1. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for the purpose of trafficking under s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: No.

2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: It is unnecessary to answer this question.

3. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for the purpose of trafficking under s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 15(1) of the Charter by discriminating against a certain group of persons on the basis of their substance orientation, occupation orientation, or both?

Answer: No.

4. If the answer to Question 3 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: It is unnecessary to answer this question.

188 The constitutional questions in the Caine appeal should be answered as follows:

(1) Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: No.

(2) If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: It is unnecessary to answer this question.

(3) Is the prohibition on the possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada as being a law enacted for the peace, order and good government of Canada pursuant to s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867; as being enacted pursuant to the criminal law power in s. 91(27) thereof; or otherwise?

Answer: Yes.

Arbour J.*:

189 The appeal of the appellant Caine calls into question the constitutionality of the provisions prohibiting possession of cannabis (marihuana) for personal use. The provisions are attacked on the ground that they are not within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada and that they infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In addition to challenging the prohibition on simple possession, the appellant Malmo-Levine also challenges the prohibition of possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking on the ground that it infringes ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. The case of the appellant Clay (R. v. Clay, 2003 SCC 75 (S.C.C.)), on appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario (2000), 49 O.R. (3d) 577 (Ont. C.A.), was heard together with the cases of the appellants Caine and Malmo-Levine, on appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia (2000), 138 B.C.A.C. 218, 2000 BCCA 335 (B.C. C.A.). The Clay appeal raises issues identical to the Caine appeal and is based on similar findings of fact. Therefore, I will address all three appeals in these reasons and refer to the findings of the courts below in Ontario and in British Columbia.

190 We are asked to address, directly for the first time, whether the Charter requires that harm to others or to society be an essential element of an offence punishable by imprisonment. In a landmark 1985 case, Lamer J. (as he then was) said: "A law that has the potential to convict a person who has not really done anything wrong offends the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a penalty, such a law then violates a person's right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter . . . " (Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.), at p. 492 ("Motor Vehicle Reference")). In my view, a "person who has not really done anything wrong" is a person whose conduct caused little or no reasoned risk of harm or whose harmful conduct was not his or her fault. Therefore, for the reasons that follow, I am of the view that s. 7 of the Charter requires not only that some minimal mental element be an essential element of any offence punishable by imprisonment, but also that the prohibited act be harmful or pose a risk of harm to others. A law that has the potential to convict a person whose conduct causes little or no reasoned risk of harm to others offends the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a penalty, such a law then violates a person's right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter. Imprisonment can only be used to punish blameworthy conduct that is harmful to others.

I. The Facts and the Proceedings

191 My colleagues Justices Gonthier and Binnie have referred to the salient facts. The adjudicative facts of each case are not in dispute and my colleagues have aptly summarized them. I propose to simply highlight what I consider essential to the disposition of these appeals, most of which is contained in the findings of fact of the trial judges with respect to the harms associated with marihuana use. My colleagues have also referred to recent studies and recent parliamentary reports on the effects of the use of marihuana. The conclusions and recommendations in these new documents are similar to those presented to the trial judges and in my view they add nothing to the full factual record upon which both the trial judges and the courts of appeal in these cases founded their conclusions. In light of this, I do not think that we need to come to our own assessment of the facts. Rather, we should defer to the trial courts absent a patent and overriding error on their part. I am content to rely entirely on the findings of fact below as I see nothing in the new materials introduced before us that suggests that these findings were in error.

192 The findings of fact made by the trial judges in Caine and Clay are similar in all respects (they are set out in full in para. 40 of the reasons for judgment of Howard Prov. Ct. J. in the Caine appeal, and in para. 25 of the reasons for judgment of McCart J. in the Clay appeal). In Clay, McCart J. made the following findings of fact, which were accepted by Rosenberg J.A. at the Court of Appeal for Ontario (at para. 10):

> 1. Consumption of marijuana is relatively harmless compared to the so-called hard drugs and including tobacco and alcohol;
>
> 2. There exists no hard evidence demonstrating any irreversible organic or mental damage from the consumption of marijuana;
>
> 3. That cannabis does cause alteration of mental functions and as such, it would not be prudent to drive a car while intoxicated;
>
> 4. There is no hard evidence that cannabis consumption induces psychoses;
>
> 5. Cannabis is not an addictive substance;
>
> 6. Marijuana is not criminogenic in that there is no evidence of a causal relationship between cannabis use and criminality;
>
> 7. That the consumption of marijuana probably does not lead to "hard drug" use for the vast majority of marijuana consumers, although there appears to be a statistical relationship between the use of marijuana and a variety of other psychoactive drugs;
>
> 8. Marijuana does not make people more aggressive or violent;
>
> 9. There have been no recorded deaths from the consumption of marijuana;
>
> 10. There is no evidence that marijuana causes amotivational syndrome;
>
> 11. Less than 1% of marijuana consumers are daily users;

12. Consumption in so-called "de-criminalized states" does not increase out of proportion to states where there is no de-criminalization;

13. Health related costs of cannabis use are negligible when compared to the costs attributable to tobacco and alcohol consumption.

193 After having thus established what harms are not associated with marihuana use, McCart J. found, at paras. 26-27:

Having said all of this, there was also general consensus among the experts who testified that the consumption of marijuana is not completely harmless. While marijuana may not cause schizophrenia, it may trigger it. Bronchial pulmonary damage is at risk of occurring with heavy use. However, to be fair, there is also general agreement among the experts who testified that moderate use of marijuana causes no physical or psychological harm. Field studies in Greece, Costa Rica and Jamaica generally supported the idea that marijuana was a relatively safe drug — not totally free from potential harm, but unlikely to create serious harm for most individual users or society.

The Le Dain Commission found at least four major grounds for social concern: the probably harmful effect of cannabis on the maturing process in adolescence; the implications for safe driving arising from impairment of cognitive functions and psycho motor abilities, from the additive interaction of cannabis and alcohol and from the difficulties of recognizing or detecting cannabis intoxication; the possibility, suggested by reports in other countries and clinical observations on this continent, that the long term, heavy use of cannabis may result in a significant amount of mental deterioration and disorder; and the role played by cannabis in the development and spread of multi-drug use by stimulating a desire for drug experience and lowering inhibitions about drug experimentation. This report went on to state that it did not yet know enough about cannabis to speak with assurance as to what constitutes moderate as opposed to excessive use.

194 In Caine, Howard Prov. Ct. J. found as follows with respect to what harms are not associated with marihuana use (at para. 40):

1. the occasional to moderate use of marihuana by a healthy adult is not ordinarily harmful to health, even if used over a long period of time;

2. there is no conclusive evidence demonstrating any irreversible organic or mental damage to the user, except in relation to the lungs and then only to those of a chronic, heavy user such as a person who smokes at least 1 and probably 3-5 marihuana joints per day;

3. there is no evidence demonstrating irreversible, organic or mental damage from the use of marihuana by an ordinary healthy adult who uses occasionally or moderately;

4. marihuana use does cause alteration of mental function and as such should not be used in conjunction with driving, flying or operating complex machinery;

5. there is no evidence that marihuana use induces psychosis in ordinary healthy adults who use [marihuana] occasionally or moderately and, in relation to the heavy user, the evidence of marihuana psychosis appears to arise only in those having a predisposition towards such a mental illness;

6. marihuana is not addictive;

7. there is a concern over potential dependence in heavy users, but marihuana is not a highly reinforcing type of drug, like heroin or cocaine and consequently physical dependence is not a major problem; psychological dependence may be a problem for the chronic user;

8. there is no causal relationship between marihuana use and criminality;

9. there is no evidence that marihuana is a gateway drug and the vast majority of marihuana users do not go on to try hard drugs; recent animal studies involving the release of dopamine and the release of cortico releasing factor when under stress do not support the gateway theory;

10. marihuana does not make people aggressive or violent, but on the contrary it tends to make them passive and quiet;

11. there have been no deaths from the use of marihuana;

12. there is no evidence of an amotivational syndrome, although chronic use of marihuana could decrease motivation, especially if such a user smokes so often as to be in a state of chronic intoxication;

13. assuming current rates of consumption remain stable, the health related costs of marihuana use are very, very small in comparison with those costs associated with tobacco and alcohol consumption.

195 The trial judge mentioned that these findings were consistent with, inter alia, the findings of the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs, chaired by Gerald Le Dain (later Le Dain J. of this Court). After almost four years of public hearings and research, the majority of the commissioners concluded that simple possession of marihuana should not be a criminal offence. The Commission made the following findings with respect to the harms that are not associated with marihuana use:

1. cannabis is not a "narcotic";

2. few acute physiological effects have been detected from current use in Canada;

3. few users (less than one percent) of cannabis move on to use harder and more dangerous drugs;

4. there is no scientific evidence indicating that cannabis use is responsible for other forms of criminal behaviour;

5. at present levels of use, the risks or harms from consumption of cannabis are much less serious than the risks or harms from alcohol use; and

6. the short term physical effects of cannabis are relatively insignificant and there is no evidence of serious long term physical effects.

(Cannabis: A Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs (1972), at pp. 265-310)

196 Howard Prov. Ct. J. added, however, that marihuana is not a "completely harmless drug for all individual users" (para. 42). She first discussed the health risks for the user and summarized her findings as follows (at para. 39):

On the question of whether individual marihuana users face any health risks, the distinction between "low/occasional/moderate users" and "chronic users" is of considerable importance. Quite simply, the risk of harm from the use of marihuana depends upon which group one is talking about. All of the witnesses from whom I have heard, including Dr. Kalant, appear to agree that there is no evidence to sug[g]est that low/occasional/moderate users assume any significant health risks from smoking marihuana, so long as they are healthy adults and do not fall into one of the vulnerable groups, namely immature youths, pregnant women and the mentally ill. On the other hand, for the chronic user, there is a significant health risk although, this is primarily from the process of smoking, rather than from the chemical make-up of the drug.

Howard Prov. Ct. J. again referred, at para. 42, to the findings of the Le Dain Commission, this time with respect to the harm that may be occasioned by marihuana use. These findings were also referred to in Clay, at para. 27, and reproduced above, but I repeat them here for convenience:

1. "the probably harmful effect of cannabis on the maturing process in adolescence;"

2. "the implications for safe driving arising from impairment of cognitive functions and psycho motor abilities...;"

> 3. "the possibility, suggested by reports in other countries and clinical observations on this continent, that the long term, heavy use of cannabis may result in a significant amount of mental deterioration and disorder;" and
> 4. "the role played by cannabis in the development and spread of multi-drug use by stimulating a desire for drug experience and lowering inhibitions about drug experimentation."

197 Howard Prov. Ct. J. also referred to the Hall Report (W. Hall, N. Solowij and J. Lemon, National Drug Strategy: The health and psychological consequences of cannabis use (1994), and summarized its conclusions with regard to the "[a]cute effects" of marihuana use, that is, the adverse effects that might occur while actually under the influence (at para. 44):

> Taken as a whole, the findings suggest that: (1) naive users should be careful and if they choose to smoke should do so with experienced users and in an appropriate setting, (2) no one should be studying, writing an exam, or engaging in other complex mental activities while in a state of intoxication induced by cannabis (or alcohol, for that matter); (3) pregnant women should not smoke cannabis (of course, they should not be smoking tobacco or drinking alcohol either); (4) the mentally ill or those with a family history of mental illness should not use cannabis; and (5) as with alcohol, no one should drive, fly or operate complex machinery while under the influence of marihuana.
> As to the "chronic effects", that is, the adverse effects that might occur from the chronic use of cannabis (daily use over many years), the Hall Report notes that there is still considerable "uncertainty" and Howard Prov. Ct. J. summarized its findings as follows, at paras. 45-46:
>
> The "major probable adverse effects" from chronic use appear to be:
>
> • respiratory diseases associated with smoking as the method of administration, such as chronic bronchitis, and the occurrence of histo[pa]th[o]logical changes that may be precursors to the development of malignancy;
>
> • development of a cannabis dependence syndrome, characterized by an inability to abstain from or to control cannabis use;
>
> • subtle forms of cognitive impairment, most particularly of attention and memory, which persist while the user remains chronically intoxicated, and may or may not be reversible after prolonged abstinence from cannabis.
>
> The "major possible adverse effects" from chronic use (that is, effects which remain to be confirmed by further research) are:
>
> • an increased risk of developing cancers of the aerodigestive tract, i.e. oral cavity, pharynx, and oesophagus;
>
> • an increased risk of leukaemia among offspring exposed while in utero; (since disproved)
>
> • a decline in occupational performance marked by underachievement in adults in occupations requiring high level cognitive skills, and impaired educational attainment in adolescents;
>
> • birth defects occurring among children of women who used cannabis during pregnancies. (since disproved)
>
> Both Dr. Kalant and Dr. Connolly agreed that research since the publication of the Hall Report (1994) has failed to reveal any foundation for the above-noted concerns regarding (1) leukaemia among off-spring, and (2) birth defects among children of women who used marihuana during pregnancy. These concerns would no longer be considered as "risks" in the scientific community.
> Finally, the Hall Report identifies three traditional "high risk groups":

> (1) Adolescents with a history of poor school performance whose educational achievements may be further limited by cognitive impairments if chronically intoxicated, or who start using cannabis at an early age (there being a concern that such youths are at higher risk of becoming chronic users of cannabis as well as other drugs);
>
> (2) Women of childbearing age, because of the concern with the effects of smoking cannabis while pregnant; and
> (3) Persons with pre-existing diseases such as cardiovascular diseases, respiratory diseases, schizophrenia or other drug dependencies, all of whom may face a risk of precipitating or exacerbating the symptoms of their d[is]eases.

198 On the basis of this evidence, Howard Prov. Ct. J. concluded as follows with respect to the health risks to the user occasioned by marihuana use (at para. 48):

> There was general agreement among the witnesses who appeared before me (save perhaps for Dr. Morgan) that the conclusions contained in the Hall Report were sound (except for the references to leukemia and birth defects), based on the scientific information available at this time. It should be noted that, apart from the "acute effects", which are rare and transient, none of the above reports raise any significant concerns about the well-being of a healthy adult who is a low/occasional/moderate user of marihuana.

199 Howard Prov. Ct. J. then discussed the risk of harm to others or to society as a whole. She concluded that the only possible harm to individual members of society is related to the fact that an "individual who is in a state of intoxication induced by marihuana poses a risk to the health and safety of others should he or she drive, fly or operate complex machinery" (para. 49). However, Howard Prov. Ct. J. noted that while the state had a legitimate interest in protecting members of society from such conduct, s. 253(a) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, ch. C-46, already achieves this purpose. With respect to harm to society as a whole, Howard Prov. Ct. J., at paras. 51-52, concluded that

> [t]he current widespread use of marihuana does not appear to have had any significant impact on the health care system of this province and, more importantly, it has not been perceived by our health care officials as a significant health concern, either provincially or nationally....
>
> The evidence establishes that any health care concerns (including financial concerns) associated with marihuana use in this country are minor compared to the social, criminal and financial costs associated with the use of alcohol or to bacc[o].

200 Finally, Howard Prov. Ct. J. considered the harm caused by the prohibition of marihuana, which she summarized as follows, at para. 63:

> 1. countless Canadians, mostly adolescents and young adults, are being prosecuted in the "criminal" courts, subjected to the threat of (if not actual) imprisonment, and branded with criminal records for engaging [in] an activity that is remark[a]bly benign (estimates suggest that over 600,000 Canadians now have criminal records for cannabis related offences); meanwhile others are free to consume society's drugs of choice, alcohol and tobacco, even though these drugs are known killers;
>
> 2. disrespect for the law by upwards of one million persons who are prepared to engage in this activity, notwithstanding the legal prohibition;
>
> 3. distrust, by users, of health and educational authorities who, in the past, have promoted false and exaggerated allegations about marihuana; the risk is that marihuana users, especially the young, will no longer listen, even to the truth;
>
> 4. lack of open communication between young persons and their elders about their use of the drug or any problems they are experiencing with it, given that it is illegal;

> 5. the risk that our young people will be associating with actual criminals and hard drug users who are the primary suppliers of the drug;
>
> 6. the lack of governmental control over the quality of the drug on the market, given that it is available only on the black market;
>
> 7. the creation of a lawless sub-culture whose only reason for being is to grow, import and distribute a drug which is not available through lawful means;
>
> 8. the enormous financial costs associated with enforcement of the law; and
> 9. the inability to engage in meaningful research into the properties, effects and dangers of the drug, because possession of the drug is unlawful.

201 We have to analyse the constitutional questions raised in these appeals on the basis of these facts. Although criminalization of marihuana is a sensitive political issue and raises many social policy considerations, our analysis is circumscribed by the findings of fact of the trial judges, which are well supported by an extensive record. These findings are the basis upon which we must decide whether, or to what extent, Parliament may criminalize under threat of imprisonment possession of marihuana for personal use and, alternatively, for the purpose of trafficking. We must determine whether, on the basis of these facts, constitutional requirements are met, with respect to both the division of powers issue and the Charter considerations. These cases are not about whether Parliament should or should not prohibit or regulate possession of marihuana, whether the law is fair or unfair to marihuana users, or whether the legislation is effective in reducing the harm occasioned by marihuana use. These cases ask us to determine the limits imposed by the Charter upon Parliament to use imprisonment as a sanction for prohibited conduct.

II. Analysis

202 Parliament has full legislative power with respect to the criminal law, including the determination of the essential elements of any given crime. Prior to the enactment of the Charter, Parliament could prohibit any act and impose any penal consequences for infringing the prohibition, provided only that the prohibition served "a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law" (Reference re Validity of s. 5(a) of Dairy Industry Act (Canada), (Margarine Case) (1948), [1949] S.C.R. 1 (S.C.C.) ("Margarine Reference"), p. 50; appeal to the Privy Council dismissed, (1950), [1951] A.C. 179 (Canada P.C.)). Once the legislation was found to have met this test, the courts had virtually no role in reviewing the substance of the legislation. However, with the entrenchment of the Charter in the Constitution, courts must now consider not only the vires of legislation, but also the compliance of legislation with the guarantees of the Charter (R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636 (S.C.C.), at p. 651; Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at pp. 496-97, per Lamer J., at p. 525, per Wilson J.).

203 In assessing Charter compliance, courts are to look both to the purpose and to the effect of the legislation (R. v. Smith, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1045 (S.C.C.), at p. 1071, per Lamer J. (as he then was)). As Dickson J. (as he then was) said, speaking for the majority of this Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 (S.C.C.), at p. 334, "if a law with a valid purpose interferes by its impact, with rights or freedoms, a litigant could still argue the effects of the legislation as a means to defeat its applicability and possibly its validity". Thus, as Lamer J. said in Smith, supra, at p. 1071:

> ... even though the pursuit of a constitutionally invalid purpose will result in the invalidity of the impugned legislation irrespective of its effects, a valid purpose does not end the constitutional inquiry. The means chosen by Parliament to achieve that valid purpose may result in effects which deprive Canadians of their rights guaranteed under the Charter. In such a case it would then be incumbent upon the authorities to demonstrate under s. 1 that the importance of that valid purpose is such that, irrespective of the effect of the legislation, it is a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society.

Hence, in the cases before this Court, even if Parliament has the legislative power to prohibit and sanction possession of marihuana, i.e. if there is a legitimate legislative purpose falling under a federal head of power, the means chosen by Parliament to achieve this purpose, for example the type of sanction chosen to enforce the prohibition, may infringe the rights to life, liberty or security of the appellants in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, as protected by s. 7 of the Charter.

204 These cases concern whether the provisions prohibiting possession of marihuana for personal use and, alternatively, for the purpose of trafficking, are within the constitutional legislative power of the Parliament of Canada, either under its general peace, order and good government power ("POGG power"), or under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 pursuant to its criminal law power. These cases also concern whether the impugned provisions are contrary to s. 7 of the Charter. Much confusion has permeated the debate before us and in the courts below regarding these two related but distinct limits imposed upon Parliament's legislative power. Much of the debate thus far has indeed surrounded whether Parliament could "criminalize" possession of marihuana. This issue must be decided according to the division of powers principles, and is but one aspect of the constitutional challenge before us. The Charter imposes additional constraints on Parliament when it chooses to provide for deprivation of liberty. I will analyse these two limits on legislative power in turn and endeavour to distinguish the thresholds to be met, as they are in my view distinct and serve different purposes.

A. The Division of Powers Issue

205 The appellants Clay and Caine challenge the prohibition against possession of marihuana as being beyond the authority of Parliament under the Constitution Act, 1867. My colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. have concluded that the impugned provisions fall under the criminal law head of power. For that reason, they conclude that it is not necessary to revisit the correctness of the conclusion in R. v. Hauser, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 984 (S.C.C.), with respect to Parliament's residual authority to deal with drugs in general or marihuana in particular under the peace, order and good government power. I am in general agreement with the conclusion reached by my colleagues and I will only make a few comments, which will inform the Charter analysis.

206 As mentioned above, legislation which properly falls under one of the federal heads of power will pass the division of powers challenge, but may still be found to infringe on a right or freedom protected by the Charter. With regard to the federal criminal law power, under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Parliament has been accorded the power to make criminal law in the widest sense (see, inter alia RJR-Macdonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199 (S.C.C.), at para. 28; Canada (Procureure générale) c. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213 (S.C.C.), at para. 118; Reference re Firearms Act (Canada), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783, 2000 SCC 31 (S.C.C.), at paras. 28-31). It is entirely within Parliament's discretion to determine what evil it wishes to suppress by penal prohibition and what threatened interest it thereby wishes to safeguard. Apart from the Charter, the only qualification attached to Parliament's plenary power over criminal law is that it cannot be employed colourably. Like other legislative powers, the criminal law power does not permit Parliament, simply by legislating in the proper form, colourably to invade areas of exclusively provincial legislative competence. To determine whether such a colourable attempt is made, we must determine whether a legitimate public purpose underlies the criminal prohibition (Scowby v. Saskatchewan (Board of Inquiry), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 226 (S.C.C.), at p. 237; Hydro-Québec, supra, at para. 121).

207 In the Margarine Reference, supra, Rand J. drew attention, at pp. 49-50, to the need to identify the evil or injurious effect at which a penal prohibition was directed and explained that a prohibition is not criminal unless it serves "a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law". Further, he explained that the "ordinary though not exclusive ends" served by the criminal law are "[p]ublic peace, order, security, health, [and] morality" (emphasis added).

208 The main objective of the impugned legislation here is protection from the possible adverse health consequences of marihuana use. The objective of the state in prohibiting marihuana has been summarized by Rosenberg J.A. in Clay's companion case R. v. Parker (2000), 146 C.C.C. (3d) 193 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 143:

> First, the state has an interest in protecting against the harmful effects of use of that drug. Those include bronchial pulmonary harm to humans; psychomotor impairment from marihuana use leading to a risk of automobile accidents and no simple screening device for detection; possible precipitation of relapse in persons with schizophrenia; possible negative effects on immune system; possible long-term negative cognitive effects in children whose mothers used marihuana while pregnant; possible long-term negative cognitive effects in long-term users; and some evidence that some heavy users may > develop a dependency. The other objectives are: to satisfy Canada's international treaty obligations and to control the domestic and international trade in illicit drugs.

Jurisdiction over health is shared between Parliament and the provincial legislatures; their respective competence depends on the pith and substance of the particular measure at issue.

209 In RJR-MacDonald, supra, the issue was whether Parliament could validly employ its criminal law power to prohibit tobacco manufacturers from advertising their products to Canadians, and to increase public awareness concerning the hazards of tobacco use. La Forest J., at para. 32, concluded that the detrimental health effects of tobacco are both dramatic and substantial and that Parliament could validly employ the criminal law:

> Given the "amorphous" nature of health as a constitutional matter, and the resulting fact that Parliament and the provincial legislatures may both validly legislate in this area, it is important to emphasize once again the plenary nature of the criminal law power. In the Margarine Reference, supra, at pp. 49-50, Rand J. made it clear that the protection of "health" is one of the "ordinary ends" served by the criminal law, and that the criminal law power may validly be used to safeguard the public from any "injurious or undesirable effect". The scope of the federal power to create criminal legislation with respect to health matters is broad, and is circumscribed only by the requirements that the legislation must contain a prohibition accompanied by a penal sanction and must be directed at a legitimate public health evil. If a given piece of federal legislation contains these features, and if that legislation is not otherwise a "colourable" intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction, then it is valid as criminal law; see Scowby, supra, at pp. 237-38.
> [Emphasis added.]

210 The respondent argues that there is no baseline or threshold level of harm that must be reached before the criminal law power can be invoked. The Crown argues, citing R. v. Hinchey, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 1128 (S.C.C.), at para. 29, and Hydro-Québec, supra, at para. 121, that the recognition of a *Charter*principle precluding Parliament from criminalizing conduct unless it can demonstrate a potential for serious or substantial harm would be inconsistent with the well-established constitutional principle that the criminal law can be used to enact legislation to address social, political, or economic interests or "some legitimate public purpose". The respondent submits that even though there would be a rational basis for a statutory or regulatory prohibition, a "harm principle" would call for judicial review of what are essentially policy decisions. The submissions of the Attorney General of Ontario ("AGO") are similar on this respect. The AGO argues that whether a criminal offence is reviewed by way of a vires analysis under the division of powers doctrine, or by way of a "harm principle" within the ambit of s. 7, the result will necessarily be the same. The AGO argues that the "harm principle", at least as it has been formulated by Braidwood and Rosenberg JJA., does no more than reiterate the threshold test for Parliament's exercise of its criminal law jurisdiction. The AGO further submits that Lamer J.'s analysis in Motor Vehicle Reference should not apply to a consideration of the actus reus of the offence. The AGO states that consideration of the actus reus is precluded because "the decision to criminalize specific types of conduct belongs wholly to Parliament" (AGO's factum, at para. 12).

211 It is not the courts' function to reassess the wisdom of validly enacted legislation. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. said in Hinchey, supra, at para. 34, "the judiciary should not rewrite [legislation] to suit its own particular conception of what type of conduct can be considered criminal". And further, at para. 36: "If Parliament chooses to criminalize conduct which, notwithstanding Charter scrutiny, appears to be outside of what a judge considers 'criminal', there must be a sense of deference to the legislated authority which has specifically written in these elements."

212 Although courts cannot question the wisdom of legislation, they must assess its constitutionality. There is, as such, no constitutional threshold of harm required for legislative action under the criminal law power. There had been uncertainties in the past in this regard, as some would have required "significant, grave and serious risk of harm to public health, morality, safety or security" before a prohibition could fall within the purview of the criminal law power (see, e.g., RJR-MacDonald, supra, at paras. 199-202, per Major J.). It is now established that as long as the legislation is directed at a legitimate public health evil and contains a prohibition accompanied by a penal sanction, and provided that it is not otherwise a "colourable" intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction, Parliament has, under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, discretion to determine the extent of the harm it considers sufficient for legislative action (RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 32; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), supra, at para. 27). Obviously, however, where Parliament relies on the protection of health as its legitimate public purpose, it has to demonstrate the "injurious or undesirable effect" from which it seeks to safeguard the public. This will likely be done by demonstrating the harm to the health of individuals or the public associated with the prohibited conduct. While there is no constitutional threshold level of harm required before Parliament may use its broad criminal law power, conduct with little or no threat of harm is unlikely to qualify as a "public health evil".

213 In Hydro-Québec, supra, at para. 120, La Forest J. came to a similar conclusion for the majority of this Court with regard to the mental element dimension of a criminal offence. He held:

> ... under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, it is also within the discretion of Parliament to determine the extent of blameworthiness that it wishes to attach to a criminal prohibition.... This flows from the fact that Parliament has been accorded plenary power to make criminal law in the widest sense. This power is, of course, subject to the "fundamental justice" requirements of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which may dictate a higher level of mens rea for serious or "true" crimes ....

Just as Parliament may determine the nature of the mental element pertaining to different crimes, it may determine the nature of the "evil or injurious effect" from which it wishes to protect the public. However, while Parliament has the power to define the elements of a crime, the courts have the mandate to review that definition to ensure that it complies with the Charter (see, e.g., Vaillancourt, supra, at p. 652). As I will discuss below, the "fundamental justice" requirements of s. 7 of the Charter may, where imprisonment is available as a punishment, call for an "evil or injurious effect" of a certain nature or degree.

214 The concerns raised by the respondent and the AGO reflect the wrong focus in the courts below as to whether Parliament could "criminalize" possession of marihuana. Indeed, Howard Prov. Ct. J. in Caine, in considering the "harm principle", wrote as follows, at paras. 117-20:

> In my view, the proposals that the criminal law be used only to protect against conduct that involves demonstrable harm to another individual or other individuals or to society as a whole or against conduct that is seriously harmful or substantially harmful to society are not "principles of fundamental justice." The case authorities are to the contrary. . . .
>
> In fact, our Supreme Court has consistently granted Parliament "a broad discretion in proscribing conduct as criminal and in determining proper punishment". R. v. Hinchey (1996), 111 C.C.C. (3d) 353 (S.C.C.). The principles applicable to Parliament's law-making powers in the criminal sphere make clear that Parliament has a broad scope of authority to "criminalize" conduct in order to address any social, political or economic interests. . . .
> If there was any doubt of how this principle might be applied in the present context, it was resolved when the Supreme Court of Canada indicated, in R.J.R. MacDonald Inc. v. Canada, (supra) that Parliament may legislate under the criminal law power to protect Canadians from harmful drugs.... The correct position is, in my view, that which is set out in Butler, (supra) at 165. To paraphrase in terms that are applicable to the case before me: Parliament may enact penal legislation prohibiting use of a drug, when it has a reasonable basis for concluding that there is a risk of harm to the health of the user, or a risk of harm to society as a whole. [Emphasis added.]

With respect, the trial judge confused the tests developed by this Court in division of power jurisprudence, which are used to determine whether Parliament has validly used its criminal power in a manner that is not a colourable intrusion upon provincial competences, with the Charter constraints imposed upon Parliament when otherwise valid criminal legislation is alleged to infringe on rights protected by the Charter. In my respectful view, the same confusion appears in Braidwood J.A.'s analysis.

215 After a thorough review of the common law, leading treatises on the criminal law, law reform commission reports, Canadian federalism cases (addressing the federal criminal law power), and Charter jurisprudence, Braidwood J.A. came to the conclusion that the harm principle is indeed a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7. After having concluded as to the existence of this principle, Braidwood J.A. set "the appropriate threshold for criminal sanctions" (para. 139) and determined that "[t]he degree of harm must be neither insignificant nor trivial" (para. 138). In determining the appropriate threshold, Braidwood J.A. explained that he had to consider the "relationship, and parallels, between the Criminal Law power of Parliament pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the test to be applied pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter" (para. 139). Braidwood J.A. was thus apparently concerned with affording Parliament the deference it is owed in legislating in criminal matters while at the same time give meaning to the harm principle, because, as he put it: "it is common sense that you don't go to jail unless there is a potential that your activities will cause harm to others" (para. 134). This tension led him to conclude, at paras. 158-60:

> In conclusion, the deprivation of the appellants' liberty caused by the presence of penal provisions in the NCA is in accordance with the harm principle. I agree that the evidence shows that the risk posed by marihuana is not large. Yet, it need not be large in order for Parliament to act. It is for Parliament to determine what level of risk is acceptable and what level of risk requires action. The Charter only demands that a "reasoned apprehension of harm" that is not [in]significant or trivial. The appellants have not convinced me that such harm is absent in this case.
> Therefore, I find that the legal prohibition against the possession of marihuana does not offend the operative principle of fundamental justice in this case.
>
> Determining whether the NCA strikes the "right balance" between the rights of the individual and the interests of the State is more difficult. In the end, I have decided that such matters are best left to Parliament.... I do not feel it is the role of this court to strike down the prohibition on the non-medical use of marihuana possession at this time.
> [Emphasis added.]

With respect, Braidwood J.A. wrongly focused his analysis on Parliament's power to criminalize possession of marihuana. As I briefly mentioned above, and as my colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. have also reviewed, the principles regarding the scope of Parliament's criminal law power are now well established and harm may not be the sole basis upon which criminal law may be used. Parliament may have the power to prohibit certain conduct, be it under its criminal law power or otherwise, but it must respect minimum Charter requirements before it resorts to imprisonment as a sanction. In other words, the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice operates to prevent restriction of liberty under s. 7 of the Charter and not as a constraint inherent in Parliament's criminal law power.

216 The focus must therefore be on the use of imprisonment as a sanction attaching to a prohibited conduct. This becomes obvious upon consideration of the various sources of legislative power under which Parliament may prohibit and sanction certain activities or behaviours. To situate the harm principle within the principles regarding the criminal law power of Parliament would in fact exclude the applicability of this principle of fundamental justice to other prohibitions enforceable by imprisonment and, of course, to the enforcement of provincial statutes. For example, as my colleagues explained, the residual POGG power has application in only three situations: (i) a national emergency; (ii) the federal competence arose because the subject matter did not exist at the time of Confederation and clearly cannot be put into the class of matters of merely local or private nature; and (iii) where the subject matter "goes beyond local or provincial concern or interest and must, from its inherent nature, be the concern of the Dominion as a whole" (Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General) (1979), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914 (S.C.C.)). The determination of whether the impugned legislation meets these criteria thus focuses on characteristics of the legislation that have nothing to do with those falling under the criminal law power, such as the necessity to identify an evil or injurious effect at which the prohibition is directed and a valid criminal law purpose. Needless to say, no harm, be it to identifiable others, to society as a whole, or to self, is required, or even relevant to the determination of whether legislation falls under the POGG power. The harm principle as applied by the courts below would thus be inapplicable to prohibitions enacted under the POGG power, or any other noncriminal fields of federal competence.

217 The use of imprisonment, be it for a criminal offence, a prohibition enacted under the POGG power, or for any other offence created as a means of enforcement of non-criminal legislation, including provincial offences, must be subject to the same Charter requirements. The comments of Lamer C.J., in R. v. Wholesale Travel Group Inc., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 154 (S.C.C.), at p. 189, are equally applicable here:

> In my view, whether this offence (or the Act generally) is better characterized as "criminal" or "regulatory" is not the issue. The focus of the analysis in Re B. C. Motor Vehicle Act and Vaillancourt was on the use of imprisonment to enforce the prohibition of certain behaviour or activity. A person whose liberty has been restricted by way of imprisonment has lost no less liberty because he or she is being punished for the commission of a regulatory offence as opposed to a criminal offence. Jail is jail, whatever the reason for it. In my view, it is the fact that the state has resorted to the restriction of liberty through imprisonment for enforcement purposes which is determinative of the principles of fundamental justice.
> [Emphasis in original.]

Similarly here, it is the fact that the state has resorted to the restriction of liberty through imprisonment for enforcement purposes which calls into play the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice. I note here that the question is not whether imprisonment is used frequently or only in the rarest cases. The mere availability of imprisonment dictates the constitutional test to be applied (Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 515).

218 According to my colleagues' conclusion, the impugned legislation is within Parliament's legislative powers. For my purposes, once it is determined that the legislation falls within one of Parliament's constitutional heads of power, it does not matter whether the legislation falls under the criminal law power or otherwise. The key is indeed whether the approach taken by Parliament to enforce the prohibition of possession of marihuana is in accordance with the prescriptions of the Charter. This case is therefore an opportunity for this Court to evaluate the principles developed in Motor Vehicle Reference with respect to the actus reus of the offence.

B. The Charter Issues

219 The appellants Caine and Clay assert that the prohibition of possession of marihuana infringes s. 7 of the Charter. The s. 7 analysis requires the appellants to demonstrate a deprivation of liberty that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Indeed, as per Iacobucci J. in R. v. White, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 417 (S.C.C.), at para. 38, the s. 7 analysis involves three stages:

> The first question to be resolved is whether there exists a real or imminent deprivation of life, liberty, security of the person, or a combination of these interests. The second stage involves identifying and defining the relevant principle or principles of fundamental justice. Finally, it must be determined whether the deprivation has occurred in accordance with the relevant principle ....

I will now consider each of these three stages. I note that the analysis will concentrate on the challenge of the provisions prohibiting simple possession of marihuana. At the end of the analysis I will address Malmo-Levine's challenge to the prohibition of possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking.

(1) Deprivation of Life, Liberty, or Security of the Person

220 The respondent concedes, as the lower courts found, that the possibility of imprisonment under s. 3(1) of the NCA engages the s. 7 liberty interest of the appellants. This is consistent with this Court's past holdings: Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 515; R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761 (S.C.C.), at p. 789.

221 The appellants also argue that the right to use marihuana in the privacy of one's home is a fundamental aspect of personal autonomy and dignity. On this issue, I am in complete agreement with my colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. Neither the widest view on liberty, as expressed by La Forest J.,writing for himself, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. on this issue, in B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto (1994), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315 (S.C.C.), at para. 80, nor the interpretation of security as including a right to personal autonomy, cover the recreational use of marihuana, even in the privacy of one's home. This use does not qualify as a matter of fundamental importance so as to engage the liberty and security interests under s. 7 of the Charter. Put another way:

> ...the autonomy protected by the s. 7 right to liberty encompasses only those matters that can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence.

Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844 (S.C.C.), at para. 66

222 The threat of imprisonment clearly engages the s. 7 liberty interest of the appellants; since no one has addressed whether sanctions other than imprisonment could engage the right to liberty or security of the person, I will limit my analysis to the threat of imprisonment. Thus, I need not address here, given the scope of my analysis and the nature of this appeal, whether the imposition of a fine for simple possession of marihuana, or imprisonment as an alternative to the non-payment of a fine, or imposition of a criminal record simpliciter, engage the right to security or liberty of the person. Those issues were not addressed by the courts below and it would be both unwise and unnecessary to address them here. As the threat of imprisonment clearly engages the s. 7 liberty interest of the appellants, it is necessary to determine the relevant principles of fundamental justice, to which I now turn.

(2) The Relevant Principles of Fundamental Justice

223 The primary principle of fundamental justice put forth by the appellants is the alleged "harm principle". The British Columbia Court of Appeal in Caine recognized the existence of a harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice, although the majority and the minority had different views on which threshold of harm was required by this principle. Rosenberg J.A. of the Court of Appeal for Ontario in Clay did not decide the issue but was ready to accept for the purposes of the case at bar that the harm principle was a principle of fundamental justice. The appellants also submit other principles of fundamental justice which they say are applicable to the cases at bar, namely the principle of restraint, the principle precluding irrationality and arbitrariness in the legislative scheme and the principle of overbreadth (see para. 31 of the appellant Caine's factum).

224 Principles of fundamental justice have been defined as follows by Sopinka J. in Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.), at pp. 590-91:

> Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles. The now familiar words of Lamer J. in, Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.), at pp. 512-13, are as follows:
>
> Consequently, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets and principles, not only of our judicial process, but also of the other components of our legal system.
>
> . . . . .
> Whether any given principle may be said to be a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 will rest upon an analysis of the nature, sources, rationale and essential role of that principle within the judicial process and in our legal system, as it evolves.

225 As I mentioned earlier, in determining which principles of fundamental justice are at play here and in assessing their content and their scope, the focus must remain on the choice made by the state to resort to imprisonment to enforce the prohibition of possession of marihuana for personal use and alternatively, of possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking (Wholesale Travel Group Inc., supra, at p. 189, per Lamer C.J.).

a) Harm Principle

226 As Lamer J. recalled in Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 513, "[i]t has for time immemorial been part of our system of laws that the innocent not be punished". This fundamental principle is at the core of his introductory remarks, at p. 492:

> A law that has the potential to convict a person who has not really done anything wrong offends the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a penalty, such a law then violates a person's right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms . . .
> In other words, absolute liability and imprisonment cannot be combined.

Since this landmark decision, courts have been "'empowered, indeed required, to measure the content of legislation' against the principles of fundamental justice contained in s. 7 of the Charter, and specifically, to ensure that the morally innocent not be punished" (R. v. Creighton, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 3 (S.C.C.) at p. 17).

227 It is a fundamental substantive principle of criminal law that there should be no criminal responsibility without an act or omission accompanied by some sort of fault. The Latin phrase is actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea or "the intent and the [a]ct must both concur to constitute the crime" (Fowler v. Padget (1798), 7 Term Rep. 509, 101 E.R. 1103 at p. 1106); see K. Roach, Criminal Law (2nd ed. 2000), p. 8; D. Stuart, Canadian Criminal Law: A Treatise (4th ed. 2001), p. 359; G. Côté-Harper, P. Rainville and J. Turgeon, Traité de droit pénal canadien (4th ed. rev. 1998), at pp. 263-64; J.C. Smith and B. Hogan, Criminal Law: Cases and Materials (7th ed. 1999), at p. 27; A.P. Simester and G.R. Sullivan, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine (2000), at p. 21). Legal causation, which seeks to link the prohibited consequences to a culpable act of the accused, also reflects the fundamental principle that the morally innocent should not be punished (see R. v. Nette, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 488, 2001 SCC 78 (S.C.C.), at para. 45). In determining whether legal causation is established, the inquiry is directed at the question of whether the accused person should be held criminally responsible for the consequences that occurred from his or her conduct. As I said in Nette, supra, at para. 47, "[w]hile causation is a distinct issue from mens rea, the proper standard of causation expresses an element of fault that is in law sufficient, in addition to the requisite mental element, to base criminal responsibility." This inquiry seeks in fact to determine whether blame can be attributed to the accused and is illustrative of criminal law's preoccupation that both the physical and mental elements of an offence coincide to reflect the blameworthiness attached to the offence and the offender.

228 In order to determine whether the principle developed in the Motor Vehicle Reference may apply to ground an element of fault in the actus reus, it is instructive to examine the interaction between the mental and physical elements of an offence and to review how the Court has applied that principle with respect to the mens rea. As Lamer J. explained in Vaillancourt, supra, at p. 652:

> In effect, Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act acknowledges that, whenever the state resorts to the restriction of liberty, such as imprisonment, to assist in the enforcement of a law, even, as in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, a mere provincial regulatory offence, there is, as a principle of fundamental justice, a minimum mental state which is an essential element of the offence. . . . Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act did not decide what level of mens rea was constitutionally required for each type of offence, but inferentially decided that even for a mere provincial regulatory offence at least negligence was required, in that at least a defence of due diligence must always be open to an accused who risks imprisonment upon conviction. [Emphasis in original.]

Further, Lamer J. explained, at p. 653, that > whatever the minimum mens rea for the act or the result may be, there are, though very few in number, certain crimes where, because of the special nature of the stigma attached to a conviction therefor or the available penalties, the principles of fundamental justice require a mens rea reflecting the particular nature of that crime. Such is theft, where, in my view, a conviction requires proof of some dishonesty. Murder is another such offence.

The constitutionalization of fault requirements has indeed cast doubt on some Criminal Code offences and this Court has, in Vaillancourt, supra, and in, R. v. Martineau, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 633 (S.C.C.), for example, used the criteria of the stigma and punishment attached to an offence as determinative of the fault level or mens rea required for conviction. Specifically, the Court has decided that for murder and theft, principles of fundamental justice guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter demand subjective intent or recklessness. Thus, the constructive murder provisions of the Code which required only objective foreseeability of death and in some circumstances, only a causal connection, were held to be unconstitutional.

229 The special mental element required for these offences gives rise to the moral blameworthiness which justifies the stigma and sentence attached to them: Vaillancourt, supra, at p. 654; Martineau, supra, at p. 646. In Martineau, it was decided that the essential role of requiring subjective foresight of death in the context of murder was to "maintain a proportionality between the stigma and punishment attached to a murder conviction and the moral blameworthiness of the offender" (p. 646). The principles of fundamental justice require, because of the special nature of the stigma attached to a murder conviction, and the available penalties, a mens rea reflecting the particular nature of the crime. The moral blameworthiness of a particular offender thus stems from the constitutionally required mental element, which is determined by considering the stigma and criminal sanction attaching to prohibited conduct.

230 In my view, the principle that stigma and punishment must be proportionate to the moral blameworthiness of the offender stands only if there is a sufficiently blameworthy element in the actus reus itself. A culpable mental state attached to a conduct may only be held "culpable" provided that the offender and his conduct ought to be blamed (see A. von Hirsch and N. Jareborg, "Gauging Criminal Harm: A Living-Standard Analysis" (1991), 11 Oxford J. Legal Stud. 1, at p. 6). This was implicitly recognized by this Court in R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944 (S.C.C.), at pp. 964-65, where Sopinka J. held: "[p]rovided that there is a sufficiently blameworthy element in the actus reus to which a culpable mental state is attached, there is no additional requirement that any other element of the actus reus be linked to this mental state or a further culpable mental state" (emphasis added). Thus, in my opinion, the principles developed in Motor Vehicle Reference mandate a consideration of what is blamable in a specific conduct, i.e., what underlies stigma and punishment. Offences have both a mental and a physical element. An evaluation of the blameworthiness of conduct must take into account both elements so that wrongful conduct will not be held blamable without the necessary mental element and, on the other hand, a deliberate (or reckless or negligent) activity will not be held blamable without the activity being wrongful in the first place. Therefore, in assessing the moral blameworthiness of the offender, the inherent nature of the act committed, or the wrongfulness of the actus reus, must be considered.

231 What exactly is wrong or blameworthy in a given criminal offence is rarely an object of debate and is usually described by the harm or risk of harm associated with the conduct. Indeed, harm is so intrinsic to most offences that few would contest, for example, the harm to others associated with murder, assault, or theft. Murder affects the fundamental right to life; assault affects the victim's security and dignity; and theft affects the victim's material comfort and, in certain circumstances, his or her right to security, dignity and privacy. In fact, harm is often central to the requirement that punishment must be proportionate to the moral blameworthiness of the offender; in other words, "the fundamental principle of a morally based system of law [is] that those causing harm intentionally [should] be punished more severely than those causing harm unintentionally" (Martineau, supra, at p. 645; Creighton, supra, at p. 46; H.L.A. Hart, "Punishment and the Elimination of Responsibility", in Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law (1968), at p. 162). Typically, the debate usually does not concern whether the conduct is harmful per se, but rather whether the level of harm caused or the inherent gravity of the conduct justify an increase in the harshness of labelling or sentencing.

232 Courts indeed often undertake an evaluation of the level of blameworthiness of the actus reus. Identical levels of intent (e.g. the intention to cause death) can lead to different degrees of labelling if the act itself is more deserving of condemnation. For instance, in R. v. Arkell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 695 (S.C.C.) (released concurrently with Martineau, supra), this Court analysed in light of s. 7 whether a sentencing scheme which classified murders done while committing certain underlying offences as more serious, and thereby attaching more serious penalties to them, was unconstitutional. This Court found the increased harshness of labelling and punishment to be constitutionally valid under s. 7. Lamer C.J. came to this by examining the blameworthiness of the offence (at p. 704):

> The section is based on an organizing principle that treats murders committed while the perpetrator is illegally dominating another person as more serious than other murders. Further, the relationship between the classification and the moral blameworthiness of the offender clearly exists.... Parliament's decision to treat more seriously murders that have been committed while the offender is exploiting a position of power through illegal domination of the victim accords with the > principle that there must be a proportionality between a sentence and the moral blameworthiness of the offender and other considerations such as deterrence and societal condemnation of the acts of the offender.

> [Emphasis added.]

233 Harm is frequently the determining factor in assessing the severity of an offence and in distinguishing between levels of responsibility for equally mentally blamable acts. For example, under s. 7, this Court, in DeSousa (per Sopinka J.), held that Parliament could treat crimes that produce certain consequences as more serious than crimes that lack those consequences: "[I]t is acceptable to distinguish between criminal responsibility for equally reprehensible acts on the basis of the harm that is actually caused" (p. 967). See also R. v. Williams, 2003 SCC 41 (S.C.C.), at paras. 43-46.

234 These principles are also in line with all sentencing principles adopted by this Court. Indeed, harm, or the seriousness of prohibited conduct, along with mental blameworthiness, form the basis for culpability, and go hand in hand to determine the appropriate sentence (see D. E. Scheid, "Constructing a Theory of Punishment, Desert, and the Distribution of Punishments" (1997), 10 Can. J.L. & Juris. 441, at p. 484; von Hirsch and Jareborg, supra, at p. 2). It is a fundamental principle of sentencing that both the severity of the offence and the moral blameworthiness of the offender should dictate the quantum of sentence. As Lamer C.J. held in R. v. M. (C.A.), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 500 (S.C.C.), at para. 36: "For offences where imprisonment is available, the Code sets maximum terms of incarceration in accordance with the relative severity of each crime". And further, at para. 40: "It is a well-established tenet of our criminal law that the quantum of sentence imposed should be broadly commensurate with the gravity of the offence committed and the moral blameworthiness of the offender." See also s. 718.1 of the Criminal Code, which states that "[a] sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender": R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5 (S.C.C.), at para. 82; R. v. W. (L.W.), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 455, 2000 SCC 18 (S.C.C.), at para. 18; G.P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978), at pp. 461-62.

235 Hence, harm or the risk of harm is a determinative factor in the assessment of the seriousness or wrongfulness of prohibited conduct. Harm associated with victimizing conduct, i.e., conduct which infringes on the rights and freedoms of identifiable persons, is the most obvious, and the concern usually is with how much the person has been harmed. This, in turn, is likely to dictate the extent of punishment or the difference in the labelling of an offence, as well as the level of mens rea necessary to establish culpability. Other forms of conduct cause harm that is more diffuse, where no identifiable persons have had their rights or freedoms infringed by the conduct; the harm there is collective and it is the public interest that is adversely affected. Finally, other conduct is even more distant from this notion of harm, and the prohibition of that conduct is aimed at advancing public interests distinct from the protection of individuals or society.

236 The fundamental question raised in these appeals is whether harm is a constitutionally required component of the actus reus of any offence punishable by imprisonment. We have seen above that harm may not be the only basis upon which Parliament may decide to prohibit or regulate a given type of conduct. We must now determine whether the Charter requires that harm be the sole basis upon which the state may employ the threat of imprisonment as a sanction against a prohibited conduct.

237 The debate over the harm principle takes place around the traditional confrontation between harm and morality as a basis for restricting an individual's liberty. The liberal view was initially espoused by Victorian philosopher and economist John Stuart Mill in his essay, On Liberty. He wrote:

> The object of this Essay is to assert one very simple principle, as entitled to govern absolutely the dealings of society with the individual in the way of compulsion and control, whether the means used be physical force in the form of legal penalties, or the moral coercion of public opinion. That principle is, that the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectively, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection. That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or forbear because it will be better for him to do so, because it will make him happier, because, in the opinions of others, to do so would be wise, or even right. These are good reasons for remonstrating with him, or reasoning with him, or persuading him, or entreating him, but not for compelling him, or visiting him with any evil in case he do otherwise. To justify that, > the conduct from which it is desired to deter him, must be calculated to produce evil to some one else. The only part of the conduct of any one, for which he is amenable to society, is that which concerns others. In the part which merely concerns himself, his independence is, of right, absolute. Over himself, over his own body and mind, the individual is sovereign.

>
> [Emphasis added.]

(J. S. Mill, On Liberty and Considerations on Representative Government (1946), at pp. 8-9)

238 Mill's assertion was challenged by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen in Liberty, Equality, Fraternity (1967), initially published in 1874, who strongly opposed any limitation on the power of the state to enforce morality. Stephen's argument was best captured in a now-famous passage: "there are acts of wickedness so gross and outrageous that, self-protection apart, they must be prevented as far as possible at any cost to the offender, and punished, if they occur, with exemplary severity" (p. 162). This debate between Mill and Stephen was reignited in England by the recommendation in 1957 of the Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution to decriminalize homosexuality on the basis that it is not the duty of the law to concern itself with immorality as such (The Wolfenden Report (1963), at paras. 61-62). The reactions to the Wolfenden Report have been vehement. Lord Patrick Devlin, in his Maccabaean Lecture delivered at the British Academy in 1959 (later published: P. Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals (1965)), argued that purportedly immoral activities, like homosexuality and prostitution, should remain criminal offences and he became associated with the principle of legal moral-ism — the principle that moral offences should be regulated because they are immoral (see on this: B. E. Harcourt, "The Collapse of the Harm Principle" (1999), 90 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 109, at pp. 111-12; B. Lauzon, Les champs légitimes du droit criminel et leur application aux manipulations génétiques transmissibles aux générations futures (2002), at p. 26).

239 This position is opposed to the liberal view of Professors Hart and Feinberg who reiterated Mill's harm principle. According to J. Feinberg, who adopts a less exclusive view of the harm principle in The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law (1984), in the first volume, entitled Harm to Others, at p. 26, "[i]t is always a good reason in support of penal legislation that it would probably be effective in preventing ... harm to persons other than the actor." The debate between legal moralism and the harm principle has stimulated academic discussions and much has been written on this topic (see, inter alia, in addition to other sources cited throughout these reasons: "Symposium: The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law" (2001), 5 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 1-319; Mill's On Liberty: Critical Essays (1997), edited by Gerald Dworkin). Braidwood J.A. referred, at paras. 107-12, to various authors who either adopted the harm principle or incorporated it in their writings. One of the most prominent, H. L. Packer, in his influential The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968) said, at p. 267, that "harm to others" must be a "limiting criteri[on] for invocation of the criminal sanction". This debate, which has remained focused, as I said earlier, on what should be criminalized, also permeated the work of the Law Reform Commissions in Canada on possible reforms of the Criminal Code. I need not expand on their recommendations for my purposes. Suffice it to say that Braidwood J.A. referred to various reports, all of which basically advocated that the criminal law should only be used, save in exceptional circumstances, where conduct causes or risks causing significant or grave harm to others or society (see paras. 113-16).

240 This philosophical and theoretical debate is of great interest and is a useful policy tool for law makers. It may also serve as a guide in the characterization of the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice. However, as guardians of the constitutional principles of fundamental justice, courts are not expected to merely choose from among the competing theories of harm advanced by criminal law theorists. As Doherty J.A. said in R. v. Murdock (2003), 11 C.R. (6th) 43 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 31:

> Nor should the harm principle be taken as an invitation to the judiciary to consecrate a particular theory of criminal liability as a principle of fundamental justice. This is so even if that theory has gained the support of law reformers, some of whom also happen to be judges. Judicial review of the substantive content of criminal legislation under s. 7 should not be confused with law reform. Judicial review tests the validity of legislation against the minimum standards set out in the Charter. Law reform tests the legal status quo against the law reformer's opinion of what the law should be.

241 This Court has discussed, albeit under s. 1, the interaction between morality and harm as a valid basis to restrict Charter rights. In R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452 (S.C.C.), at p. 498, Sopinka J., writing for the majority, held that "[t]he objective of maintaining conventional standards of propriety, independently of any harm to society, is no longer justified in light of the values of individual liberty which underlie the Charter. Sopinka J. also noted, at pp. 492-93, that "[t]o impose a certain standard of public and sexual morality, solely because it reflects the conventions of a given community, is inimical to the exercise and enjoyment of individual freedoms, which form the basis of our social contract.... The prevention of 'dirt for dirt's sake' is not a legitimate objective which would justify the violation of one of the most fundamental freedoms enshrined in the Charter". Sopinka J. however conceded that Parliament had the right to legislate on the basis of some fundamental conception of morality for the purposes of safeguarding the values which are integral to a free and democratic society (p. 493):

> Moral disapprobation is recognized as an appropriate response when it has its basis in Charter values.
> As the respondent and many of the interveners have pointed out, much of the criminal law is based on moral conceptions of right and wrong and the mere fact that a law is grounded in morality does not automatically render it illegitimate. In this regard, criminalizing the proliferation of materials which undermine another basic Charter right may indeed be a legitimate objective.

Sopinka J. found that the overriding objective of the impugned provision was not however moral disapprobation but the avoidance of harm to society, which he considered a substantial concern that justified restriction of the freedom of expression.

242 In a concurring opinion, Gonthier J., writing for himself and L'Heureux-Dubé J., said, at p. 522, that "the avoidance of harm to society is but one instance of a fundamental conception of morality". Speaking about the type of moral claim that could justify an infringement of s. 2(b) of the Charter, Gonthier J. wrote, at pp. 523-24:

> First of all, the moral claims must be grounded. They must involve concrete problems such as life, harm, well-being, to name a few, and not merely differences of opinion or of taste. Parliament cannot restrict Charter rights simply on the basis of dislike; this is what is meant by the expression "substantial and pressing" concern.
> Secondly, a consensus must exist among the population on these claims. They must attract the support of more than a simple majority of people. In a pluralistic society like ours, many different conceptions of the good are held by various segments of the population. ... In this sense a wide consensus among holders of different conceptions of the good is necessary before the State can intervene in the name of morality.

243 In the present case, the state does not advance morality as a basis for restricting the right to liberty of the appellants, although it appears to have played an important role in the original addition of cannabis to the list of prohibited narcotics (both trial judges put special emphasis on the provocative writings of Edmonton, Alberta Magistrate Emily Murphy, which, according to Howard Prov. Ct. J., "consisted of reckless assertions of fact which were, quite simply, untrue" and which "helped to create a climate of irrational fear which, no doubt, provided some impetus to the movement to prohibit the use of marihuana" (para. 32)). Had the respondent based its legislation on morality grounds, we would have had to determine the sufficiency of this justification to resort to imprisonment in light of the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice. However, it is not necessary to comment on the eventual success of such an argument because in any event, here, as in Butler, supra, the overriding purpose of the prohibition is not moral disapprobation, but the protection against harm. Therefore, we are not asked in these cases to take side in the "harm vs. morality" debate nor to determine if, and if so in which circumstances, conduct that offends morality could be said to harm others or society as a whole. The state purports to prohibit conduct that it says is directly harmful to the health of individuals, and incidentally to society as a whole.

244 I am of the view that the principles of fundamental justice require that whenever the state resorts to imprisonment, a minimum of harm to others must be an essential part of the offence. The state cannot resort to imprisonment as a punishment for conduct that causes little or no reasoned risk of harm to others. Prohibited conduct punishable by imprisonment cannot be harmless conduct or conduct that only causes harm to the perpetrator. As Braidwood J.A. said in Caine, "it is common sense that you don't go to jail unless there is a potential that your activities will cause harm to others" (para. 134).

245 In Murdoch, supra, Doherty J.A. characterized the harm principle as follows, at para. 33:

> The harm principle, as a principle of fundamental justice, goes only so far as to preclude the criminalization of conduct for which there is no "reasoned apprehension of harm" to any legitimate personal or societal interest. If conduct clears that threshold, it cannot be said that criminalization of such conduct raises the spectre of convicting someone who has not done anything wrong. Difficult questions such as whether the harm justifies the imposition of a criminal prohibition or whether the criminal law is the best way to address the harm are policy questions that are beyond the constitutional competence of the judiciary and the institutional competence of the criminal law adversarial process.

Like Braidwood J.A. in Caine and Rosenberg J.A. in Clay, Doherty J.A.'s concern was, by his own words, to draw a distinction "between the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice and closely related, but distinct policy questions surrounding the application of the criminal law" (para. 34). Indeed, he adds in a footnote at para. 33:

> For example, many argue that the criminal sanction should be a last resort employed only if other forms of governmental action cannot adequately address the harm flowing from the conduct. This minimalist approach to criminal law may well be sound criminal law policy. However, it hardly reflects the historical reality of the scope of the criminal law so as to be properly described as a principle of fundamental justice. Any attempt to apply minimalist doctrine to a specific piece of legislation would raise complex questions of social policy which would defy effective resolution in the context of the adversarial criminal law process.

246 As I said before, however, the focus must remain on the choice by the state to resort to imprisonment to sanction conduct that it has decided to prohibit through its criminal law power or otherwise. The power of Parliament to use criminal law is broad and any concern as to what should be criminalized remains in the hands of the elected representatives. However, in my view, be it as a criminal sanction or as a sanction to any other prohibition, imprisonment must, as a constitutional minimum standard, be reserved for those whose conduct causes a reasoned risk of harm to others. "Doing nothing wrong" in that sense means acting in a manner which causes little or no reasoned risk of harm to others or to society. The Charter requires that the highest form of restriction of liberty be reserved for those who, at a minimum, infringe on the rights or freedoms of other individuals or otherwise harm society. I note that the notion of harm is not foreign to s. 7. Indeed, in addition to the cases referred to earlier, McLachlin J. (as she then was), in her dissenting reasons in Rodriguez, supra, at p. 618, referred to the notion of harm to others while discussing the scope of the right to security under s. 7:

> Security of the person has an element of personal autonomy, protecting the dignity and privacy of individuals with respect to decisions concerning their own body. It is part of the persona and dignity of the human being that he or she have the autonomy to decide what is best for his or her body. This is in accordance with the fact, alluded to by McEachern C.J.B.C. below, that "s. 7 was enacted for the purpose of ensuring human dignity and individual control, so long as it harms no one else": (1993), 76 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145, at p. 164.
> [Emphasis added.]

247 Where legislation which may deprive individuals of their liberty is aimed at protecting other individuals or society from the risk of harm caused by the prohibited conduct, courts must scrutinize carefully the harm alleged. In victimizing conduct, the attribution of fault is relatively straightforward because of the close links between the actor's culpable conduct and the resulting harm to the victim. This Court has used principles of interpretation aimed at excluding from the criminal ambit conduct that is tenuously related to the alleged harm. Thus, in R. v. Sharpe, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, 2001 SCC 2 (S.C.C.), the accused accepted that harm to children justified criminalizing possession of some forms of child pornography. The fundamental question was rather whether the prohibition went too far by criminalizing possession of an unjustifiable range of material. McLachlin C.J., for the majority of this Court, had this to say on whether the causal link between a specific prohibition and the harm to children was sufficient, at paras. 74, 75 and 95:

> These exclusions support the earlier suggestion that Parliament's goal was to prohibit possession of child pornography that poses a reasoned risk of harm to children. The primary definition of "child pornography" does not embrace every > kind of material that might conceivably pose a risk of harm to children, but appears rather to target blatantly pornographic material....

>
> Yet problems remain. The interpretation of the legislation suggested above reveals that the law may catch some material that particularly engages the value of self-fulfilment and poses little or no risk of harm to children.
>
> . . . . .
>
> If the law is drafted in a way that unnecessarily catches material that has little or nothing to do with the prevention of harm to children, then the justification for overriding freedom of expression is absent.
> [Emphasis added.]

While these comments were made under s. 1, they illustrate the threshold to be met to establish a sufficient causal link between prohibited conduct and the harm alleged to be caused by such conduct. Thus, for our purposes, if the prohibition of conduct engages a s. 7 interest, as the threat of imprisonment does, while the conduct poses little or no risk of harm to others, then the law is contrary to s. 7.

248 Where harm to society as a whole is alleged, how must such harm be assessed? Harm caused to collective interests, as opposed to harm caused to identifiable individuals, is not easy to quantify and even less easy to impute to a distinguishable activity or actor. In order to determine whether specific conduct, which perhaps only causes direct harm to the actor, or which seems rather benign, causes more than little or no risk of harm to others, courts must assess the interest of society in prohibiting and sanctioning the conduct. "Societal interests" may indeed form part of the s. 7 analysis where the operative principle of fundamental justice necessarily involves issues like the protection of society. McLachlin J., in Rodriguez, supra, best summarized this idea. She stated, at p. 622:

> As my colleague Sopinka J. notes, this Court has held that the principles of fundamental justice may in some cases reflect a balance between the interests of the individual and those of the state. This depends upon the character of the principle of fundamental justice at issue. Where, for instance, the Court is considering whether it accords with fundamental justice to permit the fingerprinting of a person who has been arrested but not yet convicted (R. c. Beare, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387), or the propriety of a particular change in correctional law which has the effect of depriving a prisoner of a liberty interest (Cunningham v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 143 (S.C.C.)), it may be that the alleged principle will be comprehensible only if the state's interest is taken into account at the s. 7 stage.

(See, Cunningham v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 143 (S.C.C.), at pp. 151-52; Godbout, supra, at para. 78: "From the foregoing discussion, it is clear that deciding whether the infringement of a s. 7 right is fundamental[ly] just may, in certain cases, require that the right at issue be weighed against the interests pursued by the state in causing that infringement"; Parker, supra, at para. 113; R. v. Pan (1999), 134 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.), at paras. 177-87, appeal dismissed [2001] 2 S.C.R. 344, 2001 SCC 42 (S.C.C.) at paras. 39-40.) Considering the nature of the harm principle, societal interests will have to be assessed where the harm alleged to be associated with the prohibited conduct affects society as a whole rather than identifiable individuals.

249 Societal interests in prohibiting conduct are evaluated by balancing the harmful effects on society if the conduct in question is not prohibited by law against the effects of prohibiting the conduct in question. It would indeed be misleading to engage in an assessment of the state's interest in prohibiting conduct by evaluating solely the collective harm that the state wishes to prevent without also evaluating the collective costs incurred by preventing such harm (see Packer, supra, at p. 267: "[o]ne cannot meaningfully deal with the question of 'harm to others' without weighing benefits against detriments"). The harm or risk of harm to society caused by the prohibited conduct must outweigh any harm that may result from enforcement.

250 The impact conduct has on society will be assessed by gauging the tolerance society has for the negative effects (or harm) occasioned by the conduct in question. Similarly to what Sopinka J. said in Butler, supra, at p. 485, the stronger the inference of a risk of harm, the lesser the likelihood of tolerance. Such an assessment is contextual; it cannot be undertaken in a vacuum and must therefore be made in concreto, by reference, where possible, to the tolerance society shows to the harm occasioned by comparable conduct. The risk of harm to society occasioned by the conduct must then be balanced against the costs imposed upon society by the prohibition of the conduct in question. The stronger the risk of harm to society caused by the conduct, the greater the costs society will be ready to bear to enforce its prohibition. Here once again, if the prohibition of conduct engages a s. 7 interest, as the threat of imprisonment does, while the conduct poses little or no risk of harm to others, then the law is contrary to s. 7.

251 I stress that where direct harm to identifiable others is caused by conduct, societal interests are easier to identify because of the nature of the relationship between the state, the offender, and the victim. As Doherty J.A. mentioned in Murdock, supra, at para. 35, in those circumstances, the state's interest is the protection of individuals in the community from the harm occasioned by the conduct in question. In prohibiting the conduct and in threatening imprisonment for its enforcement, the state restricts the actor's liberty in order to protect the rights or freedoms of others. In circumstances where one's rights and freedoms are directly threatened by another's actions, the state is justified in using imprisonment to sanction the conduct, provided that it causes more than little or no reasoned risk of harm to others. The justification is then grounded in the outer limits of individual freedom which reflect the need to preserve the rights and freedoms of others. In those circumstances, it would be offensive to pursue a further analysis as to whether the costs of enforcement of the offence are such that they outweigh the victim's rights. However, where others' rights and interests are not directly threatened by the prohibited conduct, the justification has a different source. In those circumstances, societal interests, comprising the benefits and detriments of a prohibition, must be such that the restriction of the person's liberty produces a net benefit as a whole.

b) Other Principles of Fundamental Justice Involved

252 The harm principle is dispositive of these appeals. Therefore, I need not discuss whether other principles of fundamental justice are involved and whether the impugned provisions are in accordance with them.

253 We must now determine whether the harm associated with marihuana use justifies the state's decision to use imprisonment as a sanction against the prohibition of its possession.

(3) Has the Deprivation of Liberty Occurred in Accordance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

254 It is useful at this stage to briefly revisit the harm caused by marihuana use as found by the trial judges. Although there is no need at this stage to reproduce the findings of the trial judges as to what harms are not associated with marihuana use, remember that these findings displaced many commonly held but entirely erroneous assumptions regarding the effects of marihuana use (see para. 192, above). As to the harmful effects of marihuana use, recall that McCart J. held in Clay that the consumption of marihuana is "not completely harmless" but "unlikely to create serious harm for most individual users or society" (para. 26).

255 Howard Prov. Ct. J. in Caine summarized her overall findings on harm as follows, at paras. 121-26:

> The evidence before me demonstrates that there is a reasonable basis for believing that the following health risks exist with [marihuana use].
>
> There is a general risk of harm to the users of marihuana from the acute effects of the drug, but these adverse effects are rare and transient. Persons experiencing the acute effects of the drug will be less adept at driving, flying and other activities involving complex machinery. In this regard they represent a risk of harm to others in society. At current rates of use, accidents caused by users under the influence of marihuana cannot be said to be significant.
>
> There is also a risk that any individual who chooses to become a casual user, may end up being a chronic user of marihuana, or a member of one of the vulnerable persons identified in the materials. It is not possible to identify these persons in advance.
> As to the chronic users of marihuana, there are health risks for such persons. The health problems are serious ones but they arise primarily from the act of smoking rather than from the active ingredients in marihuana. Approximately 5% of > all marihuana users are chron[i]c users. At current rates of use, this comes to approximately 50,000 persons. There is a risk that, upon legalization, rates of use will increase, and with that the absolute number of chronic users will increase.

>
> In addition, there are health risks for those vulnerable persons identified in the materials. There is no information before me to suggest how many people might fall into this group. Given that it includes young adolescents who may be more prone to becoming chronic users, I would not estimate this group to be min[u]scule.
> All of the risks noted above carry with them a cost to society, both to the health care and welfare systems. At current rates of use, these costs are negligible compared to the costs associated with alcohol and drugs [sic]. There is a risk that, with legalization, user rates will increase and so will these costs.

256 The inevitable conclusion is that apart from the risks of impairment while driving, flying or operating complex machinery and the impact of marihuana use on the health care and welfare systems, to which I will return, the harms associated with marihuana use are exclusively health risks for the individual user, ranging from almost nonexistent for low/occasional/moderate users of marihuana to relatively significant for chronic users. In my view, as I stated above, harm to self does not satisfy the constitutional requirement that whenever the state resorts to imprisonment, there must be a minimum harm to others as an essential part of the offence. The prohibition of conduct that only causes harm to self, regardless of the gravity of the harm, is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a means to enforce the prohibition, a breach of s. 7 of the Charter will have been established.

257 It is important at this stage to address a specific issue raised by my colleagues. Although they find that the purpose of the impugned legislation is the protection of health and public safety in general (see majority reasons at para. 65), my colleagues put great emphasis on the fact that it also aims at protecting vulnerable groups from self-inflicted harm (see majority reasons at paras. 76, 77, 100, 108, 123-126 and 132). Specifically, they recall the state's interest in acting to protect vulnerable groups, citing New Brunswick (Minister of Health & Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46 (S.C.C.), at para. 70; and B. (R.), supra, at para. 88. They also claim that the protection of vulnerable groups is a valid exercise of the criminal law power, citing Rodriguez, supra, at p. 595; R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (S.C.C.), at pp. 74-75; R. v. Keegstra, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 381 (S.C.C.); Sharpe, supra; and Butler, supra. While the cases referred to by my colleagues clearly illustrate the state's interest in the protection of vulnerable groups from others who might harm them, they are far from suggesting that it is the vulnerable ones who should be sent to jail for their self-protection. Implicit in my colleagues' argument is that the state would be justified in threatening with imprisonment adolescents with a history of poor school performance, women of childbearing age and persons with preexisting diseases such as cardiovascular diseases, respiratory diseases, schizophrenia and other drug dependencies, who are at particular risk of harming themselves by using marihuana. I do not think that an exception to the harm principle is justified to allow the state to threaten with imprisonment vulnerable people in order to prevent them from harming themselves. To this effect, I note Abella J.A.'s sound reasoning (with which the other members of the panel agreed, albeit on narrower grounds), in R. v. M. (C.) (1995), 30 C.R.R. (2d) 112 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 121-23. In that case, the issue was the constitutionality of criminalizing anal intercourse between non-married persons under 18 years of age, regardless of consent:

> The issue then comes down to this: is sending young persons to jail a reasonable way for the state to protect them from any risks associated with consensual anal intercourse?
>
> If the prevention of harm by discouraging the risk is the objective, it is difficult to imagine a more intrusive way to protect an individual from harm than criminal prosecution.... The risk associated with unprotected sexual conduct is a health risk. It strikes me as decidedly inappropriate to deal with minimizing health risks at any age by using the punitive force of the Criminal Code, but especially so for young people.
>
> There is no evidence that threatening to send an adolescent to jail will protect him (or her) from the risks of anal intercourse. I can see no rational connection between protecting someone from the potential harm of exercising sexual preferences and imprisoning that individual for exercising them. There is no proportionality between the articulated health objectives and the Draconian criminal means chosen to achieve them.

258 While these comments were made in the analysis of the proportionality test under s. 1, they reflect my view that sending vulnerable people to jail to protect them from self-inflicted harm does not respect the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice. Similarly, the fact that some vulnerable people may harm themselves by using marihuana is not a sufficient justification to send other members of the population to jail for engaging in that activity. In other words, the state cannot prevent the general population, under threat of imprisonment, from engaging in conduct that is harmless to them, on the basis that other, more vulnerable persons may harm themselves if they engage in it, particularly if one accepts that imprisonment would be inappropriate for the targeted vulnerable groups. I agree with Packer that to justify imprisonment of both vulnerable persons and other members of the population on that basis would create a society in which "all are safe but none is free" (Packer, supra, at p. 65).

259 My colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. have argued that imprisonment for simple possession is not a serious threat upon conviction for possession of marihuana by members of vulnerable groups, since it is only in the presence of "aggravating circumstances" that imprisonment will be a fit sentence. This assertion does not strengthen their position. In fact, it highlights the main difficulty. Imprisonment is an available punishment for simple possession. As demonstrated by the cases cited by my colleagues (at para. 156), imprisonment has been and continues to be employed by Canadian courts in sentencing those convicted of possession simpliciter. By definition, the vulnerable groups are the ones whose members are most likely to suffer harm from the use of marihuana. However, by the reasoning of my colleagues, it is those offenders who are not members of vulnerable groups, i.e., those that do not risk anything more than negligible harm to self and others, who will face the threat of imprisonment due to the "presence of aggravating circumstances" (para. 155).

260 The argument of the majority that the availability of imprisonment as a fit sentence in this case is more appropriately approached under s. 12 than under s. 7 is unconvincing. Section 12 of the Charter protects against "cruel and unusual treatment or punishment". Although imprisonment is undoubtedly very serious, it is not inherently "cruel and unusual". Section 7 provides the proper scope for considering whether the availability of imprisonment for an offence and the consequent engagement of the liberty interest in s. 7 are in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. This accords with Lamer J.'s observations in Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 515:

> A law enacting an absolute liability offence will violate s. 7 of the Charter only if and to the extent that it has the potential of depriving of life, liberty, or security of the person.
>
> Obviously, imprisonment... deprives persons of their liberty. An offence has that potential as of the moment it is open to the judge to impose imprisonment. There is no need that imprisonment, as in s. 94(2), be made mandatory.
> [Emphasis added.]

It is inappropriate to restrict the consideration of the constitutionality of a person's liberty interest to s. 12. Such a stance is counter to the notion that ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter are specific illustrations of the principles of fundamental justice in s. 7, as explained by Lamer J. in Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 502. Where, as here, a principle of fundamental justice that is not specifically named in ss. 8 to 12 — the harm principle — is invoked, the analysis is appropriately conducted pursuant to s. 7.

261 With respect to the harm to others or to society as a whole occasioned by marihuana use, Howard Prov. Ct. J. (McCart J. came to the same conclusion) identified (i) the risk that persons intoxicated from marihuana may be less adept at driving, flying, or doing other activities involving complex machinery, and (ii) the "cost to society, both to the health care and welfare systems" (para. 126). Regarding the former, she acknowledges that "[a]t current rates of use, accidents caused by users under the influence of marihuana cannot be said to be significant" (para. 122). Regarding the latter, she acknowledged, at para. 52, that "[t]he evidence establishes that any health care concerns (including financial concerns) associated with marihuana use in this country are minor compared to the social, criminal and financial costs associated with the use of alcohol or tobacc[o]", but considered that "[t]here is a risk that, with legalization, user rates will increase and so will these costs" (para. 126). Hence, describing the two risks of harm to others (from driving and from the burden on the health and welfare systems), Howard Prov. Ct. J. said that at current rates of use, the first risk "cannot be said to be significant", and that the second is "minor".

262 With respect, I can see no difference for the purpose of determining the level of harm to others caused by marihuana use between the terms "insignificant" and "trivial", used by Braidwood J.A. in Caine and Rosenberg J.A. in Clay to describe the threshold level of harm, and the expressions "cannot be said to be significant" and "negligible", used by Howard Prov. Ct. J. to quantify the level of harm to society. Both Braidwood J.A. and Rosenberg J.A. concluded that the findings of fact of the trial judges show that marihuana indeed poses a risk of harm to others and society that is not insignificant nor trivial (paras. 141-43 in Caine; para. 34 in Clay). However, Braidwood J.A. came to this conclusion after he quoted in whole the passage from Howard Prov. Ct. J.'s reasons which summarizes all the possible harms associated with marihuana use, including health risks to the user. Rosenberg J.A. apparently did the same since he referred to the findings of McCart J. as a whole and concluded that this showed that "there is some harm associated with marijuana use" (para. 34). Braidwood J.A. and Rosenberg J.A. apparently failed to distinguish between harm caused only to self from harm which puts others or society as a whole at risk. Having made this essential distinction, I conclude that the evidence does not support a conclusion that marihuana use causes a reasoned risk of harm to others or to society that is not insignificant or trivial, to use Braidwood J.A.'s own terms.

263 In any event, in my view, the two spheres of risks to others or society as a whole identified by the trial judges are not sufficient to justify recourse to the most severe penalty imposed by law, a sentence generally viewed as a last resort (see Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 532, per Wilson J.). The two risks do not show that marihuana use causes more than little or no harm to others or to society. First, while the risk that persons experiencing the acute effects of the drug may be less adept at driving, flying and engaging in other activities involving complex machinery is indeed a valid concern, the act of driving while under the influence of alcohol or drugs is an activity separate from mere possession and use. Such dangerous driving is already dealt with in the Criminal Code, and rightly so, because it is this act which risks victimizing identifiable others as well as society as a whole. In my view, the state cannot rely on this separate offence to justify the prohibition of possession of marihuana simpliciter. This is indeed the approach Parliament has adopted regarding alcohol. I note that in Caine, supra, Howard Prov. Ct. J. stated explicitly that "[a]part from the above problem [operation of vehicles or other machinery while intoxicated], there is no evidence to suggest that harm of any kind will befall individual members of society as a result of any actions by individual marihuana users" (para. 50).

264 The second negative effect on society as a whole found by the trial judge, i.e., general harm to the health care and welfare systems, is simply too remote and minor to justify the threat of imprisonment for simple possession of marihuana. Much seemingly innocent conduct may have deleterious consequences. In fact, it is not easy to identify conduct which can be said confidently to be without risk of injury in the long run (see, inter alia, A. von Hirsch, "Extending the Harm Principle: 'Remote' Harms and Fair Imputation", in A. P. Simester and A. T. H. Smith, eds., Harm and Culpability (1996), 259, at p. 260; Harcourt, supra). Canadians have a universal health care system to deal with injuries and illnesses, irrespective of fault. Arguments solely based on vague general costs to the health care system cannot justify imprisonment for any kind of risky undertaking. There is hardly a net benefit to society in imprisoning, on the basis of the costs they impose on the health care and welfare systems, those very persons who may need access to and support from such systems. Canadians do not expect to go to jail whenever they embark on some adventure which involves a possibility of injury to themselves. I see no reason to single out those who may jeopardize their health by smoking marihuana.

265 In the cases before us, the societal interests in prohibiting marihuana possession must take into account, on the one hand, the burden that marihuana use imposes on the health care and welfare systems, and, on the other, the costs incurred by society because of the prohibition. Howard Prov Ct. J. noted that at current rates of use, the costs imposed upon the health care and welfare systems by marihuana are negligible compared to the costs associated with alcohol and drugs. As I mentioned earlier, society's tolerance for the harmful effects that the conduct may entail must be assessed, where possible, by reference to its tolerance for comparable conduct. I will thus simply take note of the trial judges' findings that the burden that marihuana use imposes on society is "negligible" or "very, very small" compared to the costs imposed by comparable conduct that society tolerates (i.e., alcohol and tobacco use).

266 If there remained any doubt as to whether the harms associated with marihuana use justified the state in using imprisonment as a sanction against its possession, this doubt disappears when the harms caused by the prohibition are put in the balance. The record shows and the trial judges found that the prohibition of simple possession of marihuana attempts to prevent a low quantum of harm to society at a very high cost. A "negligible" burden on the health care and welfare systems, coupled with the many significant negative effects of the prohibition, cannot be said to amount to more than little or no reasoned risk of harm to society. I thus conclude that s. 3(1) and (2) of the Narcotic Control Act, as it prohibits the possession of marihuana for personal use under threat of imprisonment, violates the right of the appellants to liberty in a manner that is not in accordance with the harm principle, a principle of fundamental justice, contrary to s. 7 of the Charter.

(4) Possession for the Purpose of Trafficking

267 Before moving to the issue of whether the infringement is justified under s. 1 of the Charter, I will briefly address the issues raised by the appellant Malmo-Levine. Malmo-Levine argues that the prohibition of possession for the purpose of trafficking under s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act infringes ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. My colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. have discussed Malmo-Levine's argument under s. 15, and have concluded that s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act does not discriminate against the appellant since the decision to possess and traffic in marihuana is not an immutable personal characteristic, and treating persons who choose to do so in a differential manner in no way infringes human dignity or reinforces prejudicial stereotypes or historical disadvantage. I agree entirely with this conclusion.

268 Considering their conclusion that the prohibition of simple possession of marihuana does not violate s. 7 of the Charter, my colleagues Gonthier and Binnie JJ. did not address the issue raised by Malmo-Levine with regard to s. 7 and, for the same reason, neither did the courts below. In fact, Malmo-Levine's challenge at the British Columbia Court of Appeal was restricted to the part of his charge relating to possession (para. 8 of Braidwood JA.'s reasons). Moreover, the findings of fact of the trial judges in Clay and Caine concern the harm related to marihuana use, but there is nothing in the factual record concerning the harm associated specifically with the act of trafficking. Most if not all of the arguments before this Court have focussed on possession for personal use. On this record, it is virtually impossible to determine whether possession of marihuana for the purpose of trafficking causes more than little or no harm to others. I am aware that the health risks associated with marihuana use could be used to demonstrate that the trafficker, involving third parties, puts their health at risk and thus risks causing more than little or no harm to others than himself or herself. However, this obvious argument cannot be properly addressed without consideration of many factors which were not argued by the parties, such as, for instance, the issue of consent (see, e.g., P. Alldridge, "Dealing with Drug Dealing", in Harm and Culpability, supra, at p. 239). A conclusion on this issue raised by the appellant Malmo-Levine would be based on pure speculation. On this record, I cannot conclude that the appellant has met his burden and therefore his constitutional challenge fails.

(5) Is the Infringement Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

269 This Court has explained, in R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668 (S.C.C.), the relation between ss. 7 and 1. McLachlin J. (as she then was) and Iacobucci J., writing for the majority, held as follows, at paras. 65-67:

> It is also important to distinguish between balancing the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7 and balancing interests under s. 1 of the Charter. The s. 1 jurisprudence that has developed in this Court is in many respects quite similar to the balancing process mandated by s. 7. . . .
>
> However, there are several important differences between the balancing exercises under ss. 1 and 7. The most important difference is that the issue under s. 7 is the delineation of the boundaries of the rights in question whereas under s. 1 the question is whether the violation of these boundaries may be justified. The different role played by ss. 1 and 7 also has important implications regarding which party bears the burden of proof. If interests are balanced under s. 7 then it is the rights claimant who bears the burden of proving that the balance struck by the impugned legislation violates s. 7. If interests are balanced under s. 1 then it is the state that bears the burden of justifying the infringement of the Charter rights.
> Because of these differences, the nature of the issues and interests to be balanced is not the same under the two sections. As Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at p. 503: "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system". In contrast, s. 1 is concerned with the values underlying a free and democratic society, which are broader in nature. In R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 (S.C.C.), Dickson C.J. stated, at p.

> 136, that these values and principles "embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society". In R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697 (S.C.C.), at p. 737, Dickson C.J. described such values and principles as "numerous, covering the guarantees enumerated in the Charter and more". [Emphasis added.]

270 In the cases before this Court, certain factors would be better evaluated in the analysis under s. 1, where the Crown will bear the burden of proving them, rather than under s. 7. As Rosenberg J.A. held in Parker, supra, the companion case of Clay at the Court of Appeal for Ontario, at para. 119:

> Thus, the difference between the s. 1 and the s. 7 analysis is important not only because of the different interests to be considered but also because of the shift in the burden of proof. For example, the Crown argued that in considering whether the law struck the right balance between the accused's interests and the interests of the state under s. 7, the court should consider Canada's international treaty obligations. It may be, however, that such interests are more properly a matter for consideration under s. 1, in which case the Crown would bear the onus of demonstrating that the violation of s. 7 was necessary to uphold Canada's treaty obligations. See R. c. Malmo-Levine, 2000 BCCA 335 at para. 151, 145 C.C.C. (3d) 225.

Some balancing of societal interests has been done here under s. 7 in ascertaining the existence and the content of the harm principle as a principle of fundamental justice. In many instances, Canada's treaty obligations will be apposite to a s. 7 analysis. Indeed, in some cases an examination of international law will provide indispensable insight into the scope and content to be given to the "principles of fundamental justice" (Motor Vehicle Reference, supra, at p. 503; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1 (S.C.C.), at para. 46; United States v. Burns, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283, 2001 SCC 7 (S.C.C.), at paras. 79-81). This is not the case here, however. Given the nature of the harm principle, Canada's treaty obligations are not particularly helpful in demonstrating the existence or application of the principle as a principle of fundamental justice. Treaty obligations and international law generally may, of course, also be considered under s. 1 in the determination of whether a violation of s. 7 can be justified (R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 (S.C.C.), at pp. 140-41; Mills, supra, at paras. 65-67).

271 However, while s. 7 violations may be saved by s. 1, this will occur rarely, as was explained by Lamer C.J. in New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services), supra, at para. 99:

> Section 7 violations are not easily saved by s. 1. . . .
> This is so for two reasons. First, the rights protected by s. 7 — life, liberty, and security of the person — are very significant and cannot ordinarily be overridden by competing social interests. Second, rarely will a violation of the principles of fundamental justice, specifically the right to a fair hearing, be upheld as a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

The general approach in international law is that a state may not invoke its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty (Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Can. T.S. 1980 No. 37, Art. 27; R. v. Zingre, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 392 (S.C.C.), at p. 410). However, the treaty obligations Canada has undertaken in the war on drugs are subject to, inter alia, Canada's "constitutional limitations" (Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, Can. T.S. 1964 No. 30, Art. 36), and Canada's "constitutional principles and the basic concepts of its legal system" (United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, Can. T.S. 1990 No. 42, Art. 3(2)). The express subordination of these treaties to the requirements of domestic constitutional law suggests that they would not significantly assist an attempt to justify the s. 7 violation in s. 1.

272 The respondent has not made any submissions regarding s. 1, and none of the courts below considered the issue. Given that the burden is on the Crown to establish that the infringement was justified under s. 1, I conclude that it has not met this burden.

III. Conclusion

A. Malmo-Levine

273 For the foregoing reasons, in the case of the appellant David Malmo-Levine, I would dismiss the appeal.

274 The constitutional questions in the Malmo-Levine appeal should be answered as follows:

1. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for the purpose of trafficking under s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: No.

2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: It is unnecessary to answer this question.

3. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for the purpose of trafficking under s. 4(2) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 15(1) of the Charter by discriminating against a certain group of persons on the basis of their substance orientation, occupation orientation, or both?

Answer: No.

4. If the answer to Question 3 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: It is unnecessary to answer this question.

B. Caine

275 In the case of the appellant Victor Eugene Caine, I would allow the appeal and set aside the conviction for simple possession.

276 The constitutional questions in the Caine appeal should be answered as follows:

1. Does prohibiting possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: Yes.

2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, is the infringement justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

Answer: No.

3. Is the prohibition on the possession of Cannabis (marihuana) for personal use under s. 3(1) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1, by reason of the inclusion of this substance in s. 3 of the Schedule to the Act (now s. 1, Schedule II, Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19), within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada as being a law enacted for the peace, order and good government of Canada pursuant to s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867; as being enacted pursuant to the criminal law power in s. 91(27) thereof; or otherwise?

Answer: Yes.

LeBel J.*:

277 I have had the opportunity of reading the joint reasons of Justices Gonthier and Binnie who would dismiss the appeal, and those of Justice Arbour who would allow it. With respect for the other view, I am in agreement with the disposition suggested by Arbour J. and I would answer the constitutional questions as she proposes. Nevertheless, I am not yet convinced that we should raise the harm principle to the level of a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. On this question, I share the skepticism of my colleagues Binnie and Gonthier JJ. I part company with them, however, at the point where they hold that the prohibition of simple possession of marihuana is not an arbitrary or irrational legislative response. On the evidence which is available to us and which was carefully reviewed by Arbour J., the law, as it stands, is indeed an arbitrary response to social problems. The Crown has failed to properly delineate the societal concerns and individual rights at stake, more particularly the liberty interest involved in this appeal.

278 The process of delineation of rights under s. 7 unavoidably involves balancing competing rights and interests (R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668 (S.C.C.), at p. 715). In this respect, concerns about the harm done to society or some of its members or even to the accused themselves must be weighed together with the consequences which flow from the criminalization of simple possession. A balancing of this nature must occur when it is asserted that the liberty interest of the accused has been infringed in a way that is inconsistent with the tenets of fundamental justice under s. 7 of the Charter. Such an analysis is not as narrowly focussed as a review of a punishment under s. 12 of the Charter where courts must determine whether a specific penalty should be considered as cruel and unusual because of its grossly disproportionate nature.

279 In the course of a s. 7 analysis, the inquiry of the Court is more subtle, broader, and more difficult. Although the availability of imprisonment triggers the inquiry into the applicability of s. 7, the investigation must move beyond the sole question of the penalty and the courts must take into account all relevant factors viewed as a whole, in order to determine whether a breach of fundamental rights has been made out. It is made out if and when the response to a societal problem may overreach in such a way as to taint the particular legislative response with arbitrariness. (See for example, Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1 (S.C.C.), at para. 47; Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844 (S.C.C.), at para. 76; R. v. Seaboyer, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 577 (S.C.C.), at pp. 621, 625.)

280 On the evidence which is available in this appeal, such a legislative overreach happened. I do not need to engage in any additional review of this evidence, given that it was carefully reviewed and discussed by my colleagues. I will not even attempt to summarize it again. In my mind, it cannot be denied that marihuana can cause problems of varying nature and severity to some people or to groups of them. Nevertheless, the harm its consumption may cause seems rather mild on the evidence we have. In contrast, the harm and the problems connected with the form of criminalization chosen by Parliament seem plain and important. Few people appear to be jailed for simple possession but the law remains on the books. The reluctance to enforce it to the extent of actually jailing people for the offence of simple possession seems consistent with the perception that the law, as it stands, amounts to some sort of legislative overreach to the apprehended problems associated with marihuana consumption. Moreover, besides the availability of jail as a punishment, the enforcement of the law has tarred hundreds of thousands of Canadians with the stigma of a criminal record. They have had to bear the burden of the consequences of such criminal records as Arbour J. points out. The fundamental liberty interest has been infringed by the adoption and implementation of a legislative response which is disproportionate to the societal problems at issue. It is thus arbitrary and in breach of s. 7 of the Charter. For these reasons, I agree with Arbour J. that fundamental rights are at stake, that they were breached, and that this Court must intervene as part of its duty under the Constitution to uphold the fundamental principles of our constitutional order.

Deschamps J.*:

281 The appellants contest Parliament's power to prohibit the simple possession of marihuana. Their challenge is based on two grounds: the division of powers and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

282 Like my colleagues, I conclude that, in Canada, the prohibition of the possession of drugs lies within federal jurisdiction. At issue here is Parliament's power to prohibit certain conduct by imposing a sanction of imprisonment, whether pursuant to its jurisdiction over peace, order and good government or under its criminal law power. As the exercise for determining the proper division of powers depends more upon a categorization of the nature of the enactment than on the enactment's legality, which is the focus of a Charter challenge, I find that Parliament may validly exercise its coercive power by invoking a ground falling within its criminal law jurisdiction, namely health.

283 There remains the question of conformity with the Charter. Four main arguments are raised: Parliament may not use its coercive power to limit an individual's personal freedom to use marihuana; the purpose of the original statute (The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923, S.C. 1923, c. 22) has shifted over time; the prohibition is unconstitutional because marihuana does not harm anyone other than its users; and the prohibition is disproportionate and arbitrary.

284 I agree with the majority of this Court on the arguments relating to the protection of lifestyle and the shifting purpose of the Act. I will limit my comments to the arguments concerning the "harm principle" and the arbitrary nature of the legislation. The latter argument leads me to conclude that the inclusion of cannabis in the schedule to the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. N-1 (rep. S.C. 1996, c. 19, s. 94), infringes the appellants' right to liberty.

I. The Harm Principle

285 The "harm principle", as defined by John Stuart Mill, is cited and interpreted in both the majority opinion and the opinion of Arbour J. I agree with the conclusion of the majority in that I am of the opinion that the "harm principle" is not a principle of fundamental justice per se, but I believe it would be useful to focus on one aspect of their reasoning and even elaborate upon it.

286 A vision of the criminal law based on Mill's work, attractive though it may be, leaves the state no room to intervene in order to safeguard the moral values that are fundamental to a free and democratic society: see R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452 (S.C.C.), at p. 493. Mill's restrictive position does not fit well with the Canadian reality, in which it is accepted that social morality and criminal law are inextricably linked. Many prohibitions cannot be rationalized under the "harm principle", as emphasized in para. 118 of the majority opinion. Moreover, the state's intervention in punishing a crime is generally the expression of a popular consensus condemning socially reprehensible conduct, such as murder or sexual assault. Thus, reprehension for such conduct must generally be accompanied by the requirement that the individual understand that the conduct is blameworthy, in other words, that the individual have a guilty mind (mens rea): see in this regard H. L. Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968), at p. 262; V. V. Ramraj, "Freedom of the Person and the Principles of Criminal Fault" (2002), 18 5. Afr. J. Hum. Rts. 225. To be sure, morality alone cannot be the sole justification for the state's exercise of its criminal law power. Still, social morality remains an integral part of the justificatory framework for allowing the state to use this power, and its categorical exclusion under the "harm principle" demonstrates the limitations of this concept.

287 Moreover, I believe that restricting criminal law to situations in which harm is caused to others would minimize the role of the state as protector of society. Indeed, the fundamental purpose of criminal justice is the protection of society: see Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections — Toward Unity: Criminal Justice and Corrections (the Ouimet Report) (1969), at p. 11. The "harm principle" can prove difficult to apply, for example, when the victim is not easily identifiable, as in the case of certain crimes against society as a whole. Mill was himself ambiguous on this point. The state's use of dissuasive sanctions can also help to eliminate conduct where the resulting harm may be difficult to evaluate or prove, such as corruption, in certain cases.

288 The criminal law thus finds its justification in the protection of society, both as a whole and in its individual components. While there can be no doubt that the state is justified in using its criminal law tools to prevent harm to others, this principle is too narrow to encompass all the elements that may place limits on the state's exercise of the criminal law. It cannot validly be characterized as a principle of fundamental justice.

II. Arbitrary Nature of the Inclusion of Marihuana in the Schedule to the Narcotic Control Act

289 The criminal law is one of the most aggressive weapons the state has to enforce its dictates. This weapon must be wielded with great care. The courts must intervene when an enactment violates constitutional guarantees. More specifically, and without repeating the detailed comments of my colleagues, the courts must act when the right to liberty is infringed without regard for the principles of fundamental justice. In the present case, I believe Parliament has exercised its power arbitrarily.

290 When the state prohibits socially neutral conduct, that is, conduct that causes no harm, that is not immoral and upon which there is no societal consensus as to its blameworthiness, it cannot do so without raising a problem of legitimacy and, consequently, losing credibility. Citizens become inclined not to take the criminal justice system seriously and lose confidence in the administration of justice. Judges become reluctant to impose the sanctions attached to such laws.

291 Recognizing this chain reaction allows one to grasp the importance of the principle of fundamental justice which holds that for the state to be able to justify limiting an individual's liberty, the legislation upon which it bases its actions must not be arbitrary: see, e.g., R. v. Arkell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 695 (S.C.C.), at p. 704; Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.), at pp. 619-20 (per McLachlin J. (as she then was) dissenting); R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761 (S.C.C.), at p. 793. There are several basic tenets of criminal law that can be used to measure the arbitrariness of a prohibition. I shall rely on three of these principles here: the need for the state to protect society from harm, the availability of tools other than criminal law that could adequately control the conduct and the proportionality of the measure to the problem in question. In emphasizing these three rules, I do not mean to suggest that others could not be used to determine if an enactment is arbitrary, nor that these three rules must always be met in a given case. They do, however, serve to delineate the legitimate scope of criminal law. These rules are not new. They were referred to over 35 years ago by the Canadian Committee on Corrections (Ouimet Report, supra, at p. 12) in the chapter dealing with the basic principles and goals of criminal justice. I realize that such working groups usually attempt to describe the law as it should be, in a normative sense, but in this chapter, the Committee took care to outline the foundations specific to our criminal law. Those factors are still relevant today.

292 Is the inclusion of marihuana in the schedule to the Narcotic Control Act arbitrary?

293 As mentioned by the majority, the reasons for adding marihuana to the schedule to the Narcotic Control Act are nebulous, at best. The historical background outlined by the trial judge in the case of the appellant Caine clearly shows that Parliament's decision was made at a time when a climate of irrational fear predominated, owing to a campaign led by Edmonton magistrate Emily Murphy, who claimed that marihuana caused users to lose their minds, along with all sense of moral responsibility, becoming maniacs capable of murder and many other acts of cruelty.

294 Fortunately, the consequences of marihuana use are nothing like those described at that time. Although I do not accept the "harm principle" as an independent principle, I believe that the need for the state to protect society from harm plays an active role in any assessment of the arbitrariness of legislation. As a general rule, the state is justified in using the coercive tools of criminal law in cases where an individual willfully causes harm.

295 Although I do not adopt the approach of my colleague Arbour J., who would limit the sanction of imprisonment to cases where harm is done to others, I agree with her description of the consequences of marihuana use. The inherent risks of marihuana use, apart from those related to the operation of vehicles and the impact on public health care and social assistance systems, affect only the users themselves. These risks can be situated on a spectrum, ranging from no risk for occasional users to more significant risks for frequent users and vulnerable groups. On the whole, with a few exceptions, moderate use of marihuana is harmless. Thus, it seems doubtful that it is appropriate to classify marihuana consumption as conduct giving rise to a legitimate use of the criminal law in light of the Charter.

296 An examination of the second criterion, that of the availability of more tailored methods than the criminal law for controlling conduct, is equally perplexing.

297 The criminal law is an indispensable tool, but only in very limited circumstances: when society needs to be protected from an offender, when punishment is required to deter an individual or society in general from committing offences and when corrective measures specific to this field of law are necessary (see s. 718 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46). The minimal harm caused by marihuana does not fit squarely within the categories of conduct usually kept in check by the criminal law.

298 I would refer back to the comments made by Arbour J. (at paras. 192 to 200) concerning the risks identified by the trial judges. Only three groups are traditionally identified as requiring state intervention for their protection: young persons, pregnant women and certain people with medical conditions. This line of reasoning does not have to be pushed very far before it becomes obvious that criminal law is not society's preferred means of controlling the conduct of these groups. The use of imprisonment and all the other aspects of the criminal justice system, including the imposition of a criminal record, to suppress conduct that causes little harm to moderate users or to control high-risk groups for whom the effectiveness of deterrence or correction is highly dubious and seems to me out of keeping with Canadian society's standards of justice.

299 This brings me to the third factor, proportionality. The harmful effects of marihuana use have already been discussed and are highly debatable. The harm caused by its prohibition, however, is clear and significant. For the details, I refer back once again to the effects listed by Arbour J. (para. 200). A balancing of these two factors yields the result that the harm caused by prohibiting marihuana is fundamentally disproportionate to the problems created by its use that the state seeks to suppress.

300 While I am more comfortable using three criteria for evaluating constitutionality rather than just one, I nevertheless agree with LeBel J.'s analysis with regard to proportionality.

301 The harm caused by using the criminal law to punish the simple use of marihuana far outweighs the benefits that its prohibition can bring. LeBel J. notes that the fact that jail sentences are rarely imposed illustrates the perception of judges that imprisonment is not a sanction that befits the inherent dangers of using marihuana. In the case of the appellant Caine, Howard Prov. Ct. J. also observed that the prohibition had brought the law into disrepute in the eyes of over one million people. These are exactly the kinds of reactions that are indicative of the arbitrariness of the impugned provisions. As I have already mentioned, and as Howard Prov. Ct. J. observed, when the state prohibits socially neutral conduct, it exposes itself to the risk of eroding its credibility.

302 Canadian society is changing. Its knowledge base is growing, and its morals are evolving. Even if it was once the case, and in my view it never was, the prohibition against cannabis is no longer defensible. My analysis leads me to conclude that the little harm caused by marihuana casts doubt on the appropriateness of state intervention in this case. When I weigh the prohibition against, first, other available methods for countering the harm that marihuana use presents and, second, the problems caused by marihuana use, I must conclude that the legislation is inconsistent with the constitutional guarantee in s. 7 of the Charter.

303 The respondent did not attempt to justify the prohibition under s. 1 of the Charter. It has therefore not satisfied its burden.

304 For these reasons, I agree with the disposition proposed by Arbour J.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX A

Extracts from a document entitled Cannabis: a health perspective and research agenda, Division of Mental Health and Prevention of Substance Abuse, World Health Organization (1997), at pp. 30-31:

Chronic health effects of cannabis use

The chronic use of cannabis produces additional health hazards including:

- selective impairments of cognitive functioning which include the organization and integration of complex information involving various mechanisms of attention and memory processes;

- prolonged use may lead to greater impairment, which may not recover with cessation of use, and which could affect daily life functions;

- development of a cannabis dependence syndrome characterized by a loss of control over cannabis use is likely in chronic users;

- cannabis use can exacerbate schizophrenia in affected individuals;

- epithelial injury of the trachea and major bronchi is caused by long-term cannabis smoking;

- airway injury, lung inflammation, and impaired pulmonary defence against infection from persistent cannabis consumption over prolonged periods;

- heavy cannabis consumption is associated with a higher prevalence of symptoms of chronic bronchitis and a higher incidence of acute bronchitis than in the non-smoking cohort;

- cannabis use during pregnancy is associated with impairment in fetal development leading to a reduction in birth weight;

- cannabis use during pregnancy may lead to postnatal risk of rare forms of cancer although more research is needed in this area.

The health consequences of cannabis use in developing countries are largely unknown because of limited and non-systematic research, but there is no reason a priori to expect that biological effects on individuals in these populations would be substantially different to what has been observed in developed countries. However, other consequences might be different given the cultural and social differences between countries.

Therapeutic uses of cannabinoids

Several studies have demonstrated the therapeutic effects of cannabinoids for nausea and vomiting in the advanced stages of illnesses such as cancer and AIDS. Dronabinol (tetrahydrocannabinol) has been available by prescription for more than a decade in the USA. Other therapeutic uses of cannabinoids are being demonstrated by controlled studies, including treatment of asthma and glaucoma, as an antidepressant, appetite stimulant, anticonvulsant and anti-spasmodic, research in this area should continue. For example, more basic research on the central and peripheral mechanisms of the effects of cannabinoids on gastrointestinal function may improve the ability to alleviate nausea and emesis. More research is needed on the basic neuropharmacology of THC and other cannabinoids so that better therapeutic agents can be found.

Appeal dismissed.

Pourvoi rejeté.

Per LAMER J. (DICKSON C.J.C., BEETZ, CHOUINARD and LE DAIN JJ. concurring): An absolute liability offence for which imprisonment is available as a penalty offends the principles of fundamental justice and the right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter. Accordingly, s. 94(2) of the British Columbia Motor Vehicle Act, which provides that the offence of driving a motor vehicle while a person is prohibited from driving or while the right to obtain a driving licence is suspended, is one of absolute liability, is offensive to s. 7 of the Charter and is of no force or effect.

The role of the court in interpreting s. 7 of the Charter is to secure for persons the full benefit of the Charter's protections while avoiding adjudication of the merits of public policy. The court can accomplish this only by a purposive analysis and the articulation of objective and manageable standards for the operation of the section within such a framework. The interests which the section is meant to protect are the life, liberty and security of the person. The right not to be deprived of these rights "except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" is a qualifier of those rights and is not itself a protected right; it serves to establish the parameters of the protected interests, and it cannot be interpreted so narrowly as to frustrate or stultify them. Accordingly, "fundamental justice" does not have the same meaning as "natural justice", for such an interpretation would strip the protected interests of most of their content. Sections 8-14 of the Charter illustrate some of the parameters of the right to life, liberty and security in s. 7 and provide a key to the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice". Those principles are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system as a system for the administration of justice founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and on the rule of law. The principles are not limited solely to procedural guarantees.

It is part of our system of laws that the innocent not be punished, and absolute liability in penal law offends the principles of fundamental justice. An absolute liability offence does not per se violate s. 7 of the Charter. A law enacting an absolute liability offence will violate s. 7 of the Charter only if and to the extent that it has the potential of depriving a person of life, liberty or security. Accordingly, the combination of imprisonment and of absolute liability violates s. 7 and legislation providing for such can only be salvaged if it can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Section 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act creates an absolute liability offence which effects a deprivation of liberty for a limited number of persons, and that is sufficient for it to be in violation of s. 7 of the Charter.

Although administrative expediency might justify such legislation under s. 1, it can only do so in cases arising out of exceptional conditions such as natural disasters, the outbreak of war, epidemics and the like. Although it is desirable that bad drivers be kept off the road, the government of British Columbia did not demonstrate that the legislation was a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society within s. 1 of the Charter.

The minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons are admissible as extrinsic aids to the interpretation of Charter provisions. However, the minutes are inherently unreliable and the comments of a few federal civil servants cannot be determinative of the intent of the legislative bodies which adopted the Charter. Moreover, to interpret the provisions of the Charter in terms of the minutes would freeze the rights in time with little possibility of growth and development. Accordingly, the minutes should be given little weight.

Nor are decisions interpreting the Bill of Rights of much assistance in construing the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice". While in the Bill of Rights the phrase is used to qualify the right to a fair hearing, in the Charter the phrase qualifies much more fundamental rights. In any event, the meaning of the words in the Charter must not be limited to meanings given by judicial decisions at the time the Charter was enacted: the adoption of the Charter was a clear message to the courts that the restrictive attitude which at times characterized their approach to the Bill of Rights ought to be re-examined.

Per MCINTYRE J.: "Fundamental justice", as the term is used in s. 7 of the Charter, involves more than natural justice and includes a substantive element. The imposition of minimum imprisonment for an offence in respect of which no defence can be made and which may be committed unknowingly and without wrongful intent, deprives or may deprive of liberty and offends the principles of fundamental justice.

Per WILSON J.: Section 7 of the Charter provides that a person may be deprived of the rights to life, liberty and security if the deprivation is effected "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". This provision is not a qualification of the right to life, liberty and security of the person but is, rather, intended to protect the rights against deprivation or impairment except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Section 7 is not limited to procedural injustice: there is nothing in the section to support such a limited construction. If a limit upon the right to life, liberty and security is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, it then has to meet the tests in s. 1. However, if the limit on the s. 7 right has been effected through a violation of the principles of fundamental justice, it cannot be justified under s. 1 because such a limit cannot be "reasonable" or "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

An absolute liability offence will only violate s. 7 if it impairs the right to life, liberty or security of the person. Accordingly, absolute liability offences do not per se violate s. 7.

Although there is a presumption at common law that mens rea is an essential feature of criminal legislation, the legislature may create liability in the absence of mens rea if it does so in clear and unambiguous terms. Section 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act creates a statutory offence, guilt of which is established by proof of the act itself. Attaching a mandatory term of imprisonment to an absolute liability offence, however, violates the principles of fundamental justice. Such a penalty is totally disproportionate to an offence which may be committed unknowingly and unwittingly and after the exercise of due diligence. In such a case mandatory imprisonment is grossly excessive and inhumane and is incompatible with the objectives of a penal system. Accordingly, s. 94(2) is inconsistent with s. 7 of the Charter and is of no force and effect under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Annotation

Over the more than two years between the decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court decision, observers and analysts of the growing body of Charter jurisprudence attached more importance to this case than to any other. The reason for this is alluded to in the majority opinion of Lamer J. Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Constitution Act, 1982, Pt. I, requires that governmental measures be struck down whenever they impair life, liberty or security of the person in a way not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice; if the concept of fundamental justice were to be measured by reference to ideas of substantive justice, the implication, it was felt, would be that courts could question the "wisdom" of a very wide range of executive and legislative acts. This would be particularly so if "security of the person" were to be read widely to include the imposition of any burden that affected the vital interests of persons.

The Charter is, of course, full of substantive policies. It speaks in favour of free speech, the mobility of citizens, equal treatment and privacy interests. Hence the significance of the Motor Vehicle Act Reference was not that it presented the possibility of substantive review by courts, but that it presented that possibility detached from any identifiable, determinate policy and based on the vague idea that public ordering should be fundamentally just. Lamer J. in deciding that s. 7 does permit review of the substantive justice of measures, is at pains to explain that this conclusion does not constitue the court as a super-legislature. The court's job continues to be enforcing the supremacy of law, including the constitution. They do not become guarantors of the appropriateness or prudence of governmental policies. Nevertheless, the line between the administration of legal norms and general political supervision by the courts has grown a little dimmer by this decision. Notwithstanding this consequence, Lamer J. is surely correct in pointing out that the words of the Charter cannot be rewritten by the court, or given unnatural meaning, in order to keep the scope of judicial review in Canada within more comfortable or more traditional limits.

The question is: Do the words of s. 7 in themselves, or in their context within the Charter, compel substantive review? Lamer J.'s chief interpretative strategy is to claim that ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter (which, together with s. 7, constitute the "Legal Rights" part of the Charter) are instances of a general protection expressed in s. 7. Some of the protections in ss. 8 to 14, he says, go "beyond what could be characterized as 'procedural'" (p. 309), therefore, since s. 7 includes all of the protections in ss. 8 to 14, s. 7 must contain substantive protections. This logic is flawless except for its starting point. Lamer J. does not demonstrate his claim that the sections following s. 7 should be understood to be preceded by a phrase stating they are illustrative of s. 7 but do not limit its generality. However, something can be inferred from the structure of the Charter, and in particular from the inclusion of ss. 7 to 14 within "Legal Rights". It is that all the rights in that part pertain to the administration of justice. Although this does not mean they are procedural protections only, it does mean that the substantive rights included are ones that bear on the processes for determining legal liability, and in the case of s. 12 (the prohibition against cruel and unusual treatment or punishment) the consequences of such determinations. What s. 7 requires is that, in the administration of justice, the principles of fundamental justice (those fundamental principles which constrain legal proceedings that impose liability) be adhered to. Under this view s. 7 would not give rise to constitutional challenges on the ground only that the substance of the regulatory order is unjust.

It appears that this limited version of substantive review is what Lamer J. asserts. The "fundamental justice" principles of s. 7 are principles which, he says, have been recognized "as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice" (p. 317). Lamer J.'s contribution is to begin by noting that the distinction between procedural and substantive protection is not compelled by the language of s. 7 (this distinction would in any event create a classification system the unworkability of which would lead to arbitrary results) and then to show that there is another distinction, suggested by the structure of the Charter, which keeps s. 7 from being seen as a mandate for limitless judicial supervision. In the context of this case, the substantive side of law erected by the British Columbia legislature (those who drive without a licence, whether they knew it or not, or could have known it, are liable to imprisonment) is bad not because British Columbia has decided to impose harsh punishment on unlicensed drivers but because the rule relates directly to and abridges a principle of fundamental criminal justice: in the normal course of events there should be no absolute liability criminal offences. To use the opening words of Lamer J.'s judgment, it is contrary to principles of fundamental justice "to convict a person who has not really done anything wrong" (p. 300).

The distinction at work here is between substantive review which evaluates the distributive and redistributive justice of all measures and substantive review under which legal processes are truncated or made particularly onerous for some classes of persons. It seems to be this latter, more limited, notion of substantive review which the Ontario Court of Appeal adopted in R. v. Morgentaler (1985), 48 C.R. (3d) 1 at 39:

"... we have concluded that, in applying the principles of fundamental justice, the court is not limited to procedural review but may also review the substance of legislation ... such substantive review should take place only in exceptional cases where there has been a marked departure from the norm of civil or criminal liability, resulting in the infringement of liberty or in some other injustice."

It would be wrong, however, to assume that this distinction is capable of more straightforward administration than the distinction between substantive review and the mere enforcement of procedural guarantees. For instance, the creation of a new offence, say, against possessing certain kinds of telecommunications equipment could not be challenged, since any such challenge would be based on the overall justice of creating such a crime. However, under the distinction drawn in this case, the creation of a new absolute liability offence could be challenged as being contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. While both pieces of legislation could be seen as substantive — they both create new classes of persons liable for punishment — only review of the latter is possible, since it alone changes an established pattern of legal administration. The results of these two situations have an element of arbitrariness. Notwithstanding this difficulty with Lamer J.'s judgment, it has contributed to the development of an understanding of s. 7 which promises to be fruitful.

There are a number of other important features in this case. The first is Lamer J.'s attempt to minimize the impact of the decision on some classes of absolute liability offences. In particular, he seems intuitively to accept that imposing absolute liability on corporations for despoiling the environment would not be unjust. This recognition of the difficulties in coming to a fixed opinion about the requirements imposed by the principles of fundamental justice is sensible. He advances two possible ameliorating strategies. First, he suggests that s. 7 may not be available to corporations. It is true that the section extends its protection to "everyone", whereas s. 11 uses "person", a word which more clearly includes corporate persons. However, "everyone" is used in s. 2 and s. 8, two sections which the Supreme Court of Canada has already applied for the benefit of corporations: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, [1985] 3 W.W.R. 481, 37 Alta. L.R. (2d) 97, 85 C.L.L.C. 14,023, 18 C.C.C. (3d) 385, 18 D.L.R. (4th) 321, 13 C.R.R. 64, 60 A.R. 161, 58 N.R. 81, and Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, 41 C.R. (3d) 97 (sub nom. Dir. of Investigation & Research, Combines Investigation Branch v. Southam Inc.), [1984] 6 W.W.R. 577, 33 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193, 27 B.L.R. 297, 84 D.T.C. 6467, 14 C.C.C. (3d) 97, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 641, 2 C.P.R. (3d) 1, 9 C.R.R. 355, 55 A.R. 291, 55 N.R. 241, respectively. It might be possible to argue that a corporation cannot lose life, liberty or security of the person. However, it is certainly possible that the last category will be construed to include important business assets the loss of which would frustrate the operation of a corporation.

The other strategy suggested by Lamer J. is that s. 1 might be used to justify absolute liability offences relating to the environment. One might wonder, as Wilson J. does, if it is possible for a court to determine that a law does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice yet conclude that it is a reasonable limit on a right. Of course, in an emergency situation it might make sense to say that a law does not meet fundamental justice but that the abridgment is tolerable in the particular political context. However, in the instance of environmental protection that Lamer J. addresses it would be preferable for a court simply to acknowledge that not in every circumstance do absolute liability offences violate principles of fundamental justice.

Another significant feature of Lamer J.'s opinion is his treatment of two interpretative devices which have been increasingly used since the advent of the Charter: legislative history and American "rights" jurisprudence. His rejection of the argument based on legislative history is, in the context of this case, particularly significant. The making of the Charter did not lead to a great deal of analytical debate or very many crisply-expressed decisions about what was wanted. The scope of review created by s. 7 was one of the very few matters on which there was a clear preference and a clear answer. In both the Joint Parliamentary Committee and the House of Commons, members voiced concern that the Charter, particularly s. 7, would permit court review of the substantive merits of legislation. In both places, assurances were given that this would not be the result: see Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, no. 40 (27th January 1981) and House of Commons Debates, 32nd Parl., 1st Sess., 13438 (27th November 1981). Consequently, Lamer J.'s decision to give this evidence "minimal weight" (p. 314) represents a significant blow to the efficacy of any argument based on the legislative record.

One of the reasons given by Lamer J. for not paying regard to legislative history is that to do so would rob the Charter of its adaptability. As he states at p. 314, "the rights, freedom and values embodied in the Charter [would] in effect become frozen in time to the moment of adoption". In general terms, Lamer J. is right. It would be absurd to limit the Charter to circumstances that the legislators anticipated or to let legislators' ideas of specific applications become determinative. However, the issue raised in this case is not one of specific application. Whether s. 7 is limited to procedural protections is a large, general and constitutive question. The legislative record examined in the case goes to the question of the Charter's fundamental purposes. However, Lamer J. cannot be faulted for rejecting the message of the legislative history pertaining to s. 7; he concludes, on the basis of the text and structure of the Charter, that the meaning is clear (s. 7 is not designed to guarantee procedural requirements only), and therefore he is right not be influenced by the views of Parliamentarians and public officials.

With respect to Lamer J.'s rejection of the relevance of American precedents, this will provide great comfort to counsel faced with jurisprudence from the United States Supreme Court which weakens their case. Lamer J.'s words, however, should not be taken at face value. It is true that there are, as he says at p. 305, "fundamental structural differences between the two constitutions". This case illustrates one of them. This does not mean, however, that other constitutional values embodied in the Charter are so distinctive that American jurisprudence could not shed light on possible meanings. The Charter's guarantee of equality rights or freedom of association, for instance, could well be informed by United States cases under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The inclusion of s. 1 or s. 33 in the Charter (for which there are no parallels in the United States Constitution) does not render cases under the latter constitution irrelevant in coming to an initial understanding of the content of some of our entrenched values.

Finally, Wilson J.'s exploration, in her concurring opinion, of the relationship between s. 7 and s. 1 is noteworthy, if perplexing. She states that s. 7 protects life, liberty and security of the person against deprivation unless the deprivation accords with the principles of fundamental justice. In s. 1 she sees a second condition that must be satisfied if the deprivation is to be permissible — it must be a reasonable limit prescribed by law. In other words, she takes the converse view to Lamer J.'s. He says deprivation must be either in accordance with principles of fundamental justice or a reasonable limit of s. 7 rights. She requires deprivations to be both just and reasonable before being valid. Although Wilson J.'s reading is syntactically plausible, it leads to surprising results. It leads to the conclusion that a deprivation of liberty might accord with principles of fundamental justice but would nevertheless be an unreasonable limit on the liberty right. The two tests would seem to draw on similar factors and, except for the circumstance of an emergency, it is not clear how different results would arise. One explanation is, however, possible. A deprivation of liberty might accord with principles of fundamental justice in the sense that the administration of the criminal proscription did not entail abridgements of fundamental criminal law principles. However, the crime and the resultant loss of liberty might not be reasonable when measured against a general standard of social justice. This strategy of raising liberty to an independent right and requiring all deprivations to satisfy the s. 1 test of reasonable limit leads to the fullest substantive review possible, a conclusion which the rest of the court was careful not to come to.

Words and phrases considered:

FUNDAMENTAL JUSTICE

. . . I am of the view that it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" [in s. 7 of the Charter] as being synonymous with natural justice as the Attorney-General of British Columbia and others have suggested.

To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this Court toward the interpretation of Charter rights in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker (1984), 11 C.C.C. (3d) 481 . . . per Estey J. and [Canada (Director of Investigation & Research, Combines Investigation Branch) v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145].

. . . it seems to me that to replace "fundamental justice" with the term "natural justice" misses the mark entirely.

. . . . .

The term "principles of fundamental justice" is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right.

Sections 8 to 14 address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are therefore illustrative of the meaning, in criminal or penal law, of "principles of fundamental justice"; they represent principles which have been recognized by the common law, the international conventions and by the very fact of entrenchment in the Charter, as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and the rule of law.

Consequently, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets and principles, not only of our judicial process, but also of the other components of our legal system.

Whether any given principle may be said to be a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 will rest upon an analysis of the nature, sources, rationale and essential role of [those] principles within the judicial process and in our legal system, as it evolves.

Consequently, those words cannot be given any exhaustive content or simple enumerative definition, but will take on concrete meaning as the courts address alleged violations of s. 7.

PRINCIPLES OF FUNDAMENTAL JUSTICE

The term "principles of fundamental justice" [in s. 7 of the Charter] is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right.

Sections 8 to 14 address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are therefore illustrative of the meaning, in criminal or penal law, of "principles of fundamental justice"; they represent principles which have been recognized by the common law, the international conventions and by the very fact of entrenchment in the Charter, as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and the rule of law.

Consequently, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets and principles, not only of our judicial process, but also of the other components of our legal system.

We should not be surprised to find that many of the principles of fundamental justice are procedural in nature. Our common law has largely been a law of remedies and procedures . . . This is not to say, however, that the principles of fundamental justice are limited solely to procedural guarantees. Rather, the proper approach to the determination of the principle of fundamental justice is quite simply one in which, as Professor Tremblay has written, "future growth will be based on historical roots": 18 U.B.C.L. Rev. 201 at p. 254 (1980).

Appeal from judgment of British Columbia Court of Appeal, 42 B.C.L.R. 364, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 756, 33 C.R. (3d) 22, 19 M.V.R. 63, 4 C.C.C. (3d) 243, 5 C.R.R. 148, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 539 , ruling that s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act is inconsistent with s. 7 of the Charter and of no force and effect.

Mcintyre J.*:

1 I agree with Lamer J. that s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 288, as amended by the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982 (B.C.), c. 36, s. 19, is inconsistent with s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I agree that fundamental justice, as the term is used in the Charter, involves more than natural justice (which is largely procedural) and includes as well a substantive element. I am also of the view that on any definition of the term "fundamental justice" the imposition of minimum imprisonment for an offence in respect of which no defence can be made, and which may be committed unknowingly and with no wrongful intent, deprives or may deprive of liberty and it offends the principles of fundamental justice.

2 I would accordingly dismiss the appeal [from case reported at 42 B.C.L.R. 364, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 756, 33 C.R. (3d) 22, 19 M.V.R. 63, 4 C.C.C. (3d) 243, 5 C.R.R. 148, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 539] and answer the constitutional question in the negative.

3 LAMER J. (DICKSON C.J.C., BEETZ, CHOUINARD and LE DAIN JJ. concurring)

Introduction

4 A law that has the potential to convict a person who has not really done anything wrong offends the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a penalty, such a law then violates a person's right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Constitution Act, 1982, as enacted by the Canada Act, 1982 (U.K.), c. 11).

5 In other words, absolute liability and imprisonment cannot be combined.

The Facts

6 On 16th August 1982 the Lieutenant Governor in Council of British Columbia referred the following question to the Court of Appeal of that province, by virtue of s. 1 of the Constitutional Question Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 63:

> Is s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, as amended by the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982, consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

7 On 3rd February 1983 the Court of Appeal handed down reasons in answer to the question in which it stated that s. 94(2) of the Act is inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: 42 B.C.L.R. 364, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 756, 33 C.R. (3d) 22, 19 M.V.R. 63, 4 C.C.C. (3d) 243, 5 C.R.R. 148, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 539. The Attorney General for British Columbia launched an appeal to this court.

The Legislation

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Constitution Act, 1982:

> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society ...

> 7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice ...
>
> 11. Any person charged with an offence has the right ...

> (d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal ...
>
> 52. The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

The Judgment of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia

9 The court was of the view that the phrase "principles of fundamental justice" was not restricted to matters of procedure, but extended to substantive law, and that the courts were "therefore called upon, in construing the provisions of s. 7 of the Charter, to have regard to the content of legislation" [pp. 763-64 W.W.R.].

10 Relying on the decision of this court in R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1299, 3 C.R. (3d) 30, 7 C.E.L.R. 53, 40 C.C.C. (2d) 353, 85 D.L.R. (3d) 161, 21 N.R. 295 [Ont.], the Court of Appeal found [at p. 764] "that s. 94(2) [of the Motor Vehicle Act] is inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice". They did not heed the invitation of counsel opposing the validity of s. 94(2) to declare that, as a result of that decision by our court, all absolute liability offences violated s. 7 of the Charter and could not be salvaged under s. 1. Quite the contrary, the Court of Appeal said [at p. 764] that "there are, and will remain, certain public welfare offences, e.g., air and water pollution offences, where the public interest requires that the offences be absolute liability offences". Their finding was predicated on the following reasoning [p. 765]:

> The effect of s. 94(2) is to transform the offence from a mens rea offence, to an absolute liability offence, hence giving the defendant no opportunity to prove that his action was due to an honest and reasonable mistake of fact or that he acted without guilty intent. Rather than placing the burden to establish such facts on the defendant and thus making the offence a strict liability offence, the legislature has seen fit to make it an absolute liability offence coupled with a mandatory term of imprisonment.

11 It can therefore be inferred with certainty that, in the court's view, the combination of mandatory imprisonment and absolute liability was offensive to s. 7. It cannot, however, be ascertained from their judgment whether the violation was triggered by the requirement of minimum imprisonment or solely by the availability of imprisonment as a sentence.

Section 7

1. Introduction

13 The issue in this case raises fundamental questions of constitutional theory, including the nature and the very legitimacy of constitutional adjudication under the Charter as well as the appropriateness of various techniques of constitutional interpretation. I shall deal first with these questions of a more general and theoretical nature as they underlie and have shaped much of the discussion surrounding s. 7.

2. The nature and legitimacy of constitutional adjudication under the Charter

14 The British Columbia Court of Appeal has written in the present case that the Constitution Act has added a new dimension to the role of the courts in that the courts have now been empowered by s. 52 to consider not only the vires of legislation but also to measure the content of legislation against the constitutional requirements of the Charter.

15 The novel feature of the Constitution Act, 1982, however, is not that it has suddenly empowered courts to consider the content of legislation. This the courts have done for a good many years when adjudicating upon the vires of legislation. The initial process in such adjudication has been characterized as "a distillation of the 'constitutional value' represented by challenged legislation" (Laskin, Canadian Constitutional Law, 3rd ed. revised (1969), p. 85), and as identifying "the true meaning of the challenged law" (Lederman (ed.), The Courts and the Canadian Constitution (1964), p. 186), and "an abstract of the statute's content" (Professor Abel ["The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92"] (1969), 19 Univ. of Toronto L.J. 487, p. 490). This process has of necessity involved a measurement of the content of legislation against the requirements of the Constitution, albeit within the more limited sphere of values related to the distribution of powers.

16 The truly novel features of the Constitution Act, 1982 are that it has sanctioned the process of constitutional adjudication and has extended its scope so as to encompass a broader range of values. Content of legislation has always been considered in constitutional adjudication. Content is now to be equally considered as regards new constitutional issues. Indeed, the values subject to constitutional adjudication now pertain to the rights of individuals as well as the distribution of governmental powers. In short, it is the scope of constitutional adjudication which has been altered rather than its nature, at least, as regards the right to consider the content of legislation.

17 In neither case, be it before or after the Charter, have the courts been enabled to decide upon the appropriateness of policies underlying legislative enactments. In both instances, however, the courts are empowered, indeed required, to measure the content of legislation against the guarantees of the Constitution. The words of Dickson J. (as he then was) in Amax Potash Ltd. v. Saskatchewan, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 576 at 590, [1976] 6 W.W.R. 61, 71 D.L.R. (3d) 1, 11 N.R. 222 [Sask.], continue to govern:

> The Courts will not question the wisdom of enactments ... but it is the high duty of this Court to insure that the Legislatures do not transgress the limits of their constitutional mandate and engage in the illegal exercise of power.

18 In this respect, s. 7 is no different that other Charter provisions. As the Attorney General for Ontario has noted in his factum:

> Section 7, like most of the other sections in the Charter, limits the bounds of legislative action. It is the function of the Court to determine whether the challenged legislation has honoured those boundaries. This process necessitates judicial review of the content of the legislation.

Yet, in the context of s. 7, and in particular of the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice", there has prevailed in certain quarters an assumption that all but a narrow construction of s. 7 will inexorably lead the courts to "question the wisdom of enactments", to adjudicate upon the merits of public policy.

19 From this have sprung warnings of the dangers of a judicial "super-legislature" beyond the reach of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the electorate. The Attorney General for Ontario, in his written argument, stated that:

> ... the judiciary is neither representative of, nor responsive to the electorate on whose behalf, and under whose authority policies are selected and given effect in the laws of the land.

This is an argument which was heard countless times prior to the entrenchment of the Charter but which has in truth, for better or for worse, been settled by the very coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1982. It ought not to be forgotten that the historic decision to entrench the Charter in our Constitution was taken not by the courts but by the elected representatives of the people of Canada. It was those representatives who extended the scope of constitutional adjudication and entrusted the courts with this new and onerous responsibility. Adjudication under the Charter must be approached free of any lingering doubts as to its legitimacy.

20 The concerns with the bounds of constitutional adjudication explain the characterization of the issue in a narrow and restrictive fashion, i.e., whether the terms "principles of fundamental justice" have a substantive or merely procedural content. In my view, the characterization of the issue in such fashion preempts an open-minded approach to determining the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice".

21 The substantive/procedural dichotomy narrows the issue almost to an all-or-nothing proposition. Moreover, it is largely bound up in the American experience with substantive and procedural due process. It imports into the Canadian context American concepts, terminology and jurisprudence, all of which are inextricably linked to problems concerning the nature and legitimacy of adjudication under the United States Constitution. That Constitution, it must be remembered, has no s. 52 nor has it the internal checks and balances of ss. 1 and 33. We would, in my view, do our own Constitution a disservice to simply allow the American debate to define the issue for us, all the while ignoring the truly fundamental structural differences between the two constitutions. Finally, the dichotomy creates its own set of difficulties by the attempt to distinguish between two concepts whose outer boundaries are not always clear and often tend to overlap. Such difficulties can and should, when possible, be avoided.

22 The overriding and legitimate concern that courts ought not to question the wisdom of enactments, and the presumption that the legislator could not have intended same, have to some extent distorted the discussion surrounding the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice": This has led to the spectre of a judicial "super-legislature" without a full consideration of the process of constitutional adjudication and the significance of ss. 1, 33 and 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This in turn has also led to a narrow characterization of the issue and to the assumption that only a procedural content to "principles of fundamental justice" can prevent the courts from adjudicating upon the merits or wisdom of enactments. If this assumption is accepted, the inevitable corollary, with which I would have to then agree, is that the legislator intended that the words "principles of fundamental justice" refer to procedure only.

23 But I do not share that assumption. Since way back in time and even recently the courts have developed the common law beyond procedural safeguards without interfering with the "merits or wisdom" of enactments: e.g., Kienapple v. R., [1975] 1 S.C.R. 729, 26 C.R.N.S. 1, 15 C.C.C. (2d) 524, 44 D.L.R. (3d) 351, 1 N.R. 322 [Ont.], entrapment, non-retrospectivity of offences, presumptions against relaxing the burden of proof and persuasion, to give a few examples.

24 The task of the court is not to choose between substantive or procedural content per se but to secure for persons "the full benefit of the Charter's protection" (Dickson C.J.C. in R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 at 344, [1985] 3 W.W.R. 481, 37 Alta. L.R. (2d) 97, 18 C.C.C. (3d) 385, 18 D.L.R. (4th) 321, 13 C.R.R. 64, 85 C.L.L.C. 14,023, 60 A.R. 161, 58 N.R. 81), under s. 7, while avoiding adjudication of the merits of public policy. This can only be accomplished by a purposive analysis and the articulation (to use the words in Curr v. R., [1972] S.C.R. 889 at 899, 18 C.R.N.S. 281, 7 C.C.C. (2d) 181, 26 D.L.R. (3d) 603 [Ont.]) of "objective and manageable standards" for the operation of the section within such a framework.

25 I propose therefore to approach the interpretation of s. 7 in the manner set forth by Dickson C.J.C. in Hunter, Dir. of Investigation & Research, Combines Investigation Branch v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, *(*sub nom. Dir. of Investigation & Research, Combines Investigation Branch v. Southam Inc.) [1984] 6 W.W.R. 577, 41 C.R. (3d) 97, 33 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193, 27 B.L.R. 297, *(*sub nom. Hunter v. Southam Inc.) 14 C.C.C. (3d) 97, 2 C.P.R. (3d) 1, 9 C.R.R. 355, 84 D.T.C. 6467, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 641, 55 A.R. 291, 55 N.R. 241, and R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, and by Le Dain J. in R. v. Therens, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, [1985] 4 W.W.R. 285, 38 Alta. L.R. (2d) 99, 45 C.R. (3d) 97, 32 M.V.R. 153, 13 C.R.R. 193, 18 C.C.C. (3d) 481, 18 D.L.R. (4th) 655, 40 Sask. R. 122, 59 N.R. 122. In Big M Drug Mart Ltd., Dickson C.J.C. wrote at p. 344:

26 In Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.

27 In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection.

3. The principles of fundamental justice

28 I would first note that I shared the views of Wilson J. in her statement in Singh v. Min. of Employment & Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177 at 205, 12 Admin. L.R. 137, 14 C.R.R. 13, 17 D.L.R. (4th) 422, 58 N.R. 1, that "it is incumbent upon the Court to give meaning to each of the elements, life, liberty and security of the person, which make up the 'right' contained in s. 7". Each of these, in my view, is a distinct though related concept to be construed as such by the courts. It is clear that s. 7 surely protects the right not to be deprived of one's life, liberty and security of the person when that is done in breach of the principles of fundamental justice. The outcome of this case is dependent upon the meaning to be given to that portion of the section which states "and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". On the facts of this case it is not necessary to decide whether the section gives any greater protection, such as deciding whether, absent a breach of the principles of fundamental justice, there still can be, given the way the section is structured, a violation of one's rights to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7. Furthermore, because of the fact that only deprivation of liberty was considered in these proceedings and no one took issue with the fact that imprisonment is a deprivation of liberty, my analysis of s. 7 will be limited, as was the course taken by all, below and in this court, to determining the scope of the words "principles of fundamental justice"; I will not attempt to give any further content to "liberty" nor address that of the words "life" or "security of the person".

29 In the framework of a purposive analysis, designed to ascertain the purpose of the s. 7 guarantee and "the interests it was meant to protect" (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra), it is clear to me that the interests which are meant to be protected by the words "and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" of s. 7 are the life, liberty and security of the person. The principles of fundamental justice, on the other hand, are not a protected interest, but rather a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person.

30 Given that, as the Attorney General for Ontario has acknowledged, "when one reads the phrase 'principles of fundamental justice', a single incontrovertible meaning is not apparent", its meaning must, in my view, be determined by reference to the interests which those words of the section are designed to protect and the particular role of the phrase within the section. As a qualifier, the phrase serves to establish the parameters of the interests but it cannot be interpreted so narrowly as to frustrate or stultify them. For the narrower the meaning given to "principles of fundamental justice" the greater will be the possibility that individuals may be deprived of these most basic rights. This latter result is to be avoided given that the rights involved are as fundamental as those which pertain to the life, liberty and security of the person, the deprivation of which "has the most severe consequences upon an individual": R. v. Cadeddu; R. v. Nunery (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 128 at 139, 32 C.R. (3d) 355, *(*sub nom. Re Cadeddu and R.) 4 C.C.C. (3d) 97, 3 C.R.R. 312, 146 D.L.R. (3d) 629 (H.C.).

31 For these reasons, I am of the view that it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" as being synonymous with natural justice as the Attorney General of British Columbia and others have suggested.

32 To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this court toward the interpretation of Charter rights in L.S.U.C. v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, 11 C.C.C. (3d) 481, 8 C.R.R. 193, 9 D.L.R. (4th) 161, 3 O.A.C. 321, 53 N.R. 169, per Estey J., and Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra.

33 It would mean that the right to liberty would be narrower than the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned (s. 9), that the right to security of the person would have less content than the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure (s. 8). Such an interpretation would give the specific expressions of the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" which are set forth in ss. 8-14, greater content than the general concept from which they originate.

34 Sections 8-14, in other words, address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice and, as such, violations of s. 7. They are designed to protect, in a specific manner and setting, the right to life, liberty and security of the person set forth in s. 7. It would be incongruous to interpret s. 7 more narrowly than the rights in ss. 8-14. The alternative, which is to interpret all of ss. 8-14 in a "narrow and technical" manner for the sake of congruity, is out of the question: L.S.U.C. v. Skapinker, at p. 366.

35 Sections 8-14 are illustrative of deprivations of those rights to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice. For they, in effect, illustrate some of the parameters of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person; they are examples of instances in which the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person would be violated in a manner which is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. To put matters in a different way, ss. 7-14 could have been fused into one section, with inserted between the words of s. 7 and the rest of those sections, the oft utilised provision in our statutes, "and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing (s. 7) the following shall be deemed to be in violation of a person's rights under this section". Clearly, some of those sections embody principles that are beyond what could be characterized as "procedural".

36 Thus, ss. 8-14 provide an invaluable key to the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice". Many have been developed over time as presumptions of the common law, others have found expression in the international conventions on human rights. All have been recognized as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in "the dignity and worth of the human person" (preamble to the Canadian Bill of Rights, R.S.C. 1970, App. III) and on "the rule of law" (preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms).

37 It is this common thread which, in my view, must guide us in determining the scope and content of "principles of fundamental justice". In other words, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system. Such an approach to the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" is consistent with the wording and structure of s. 7, the context of the section, i.e., ss. 8-14, and the character and larger objects of the Charter itself. It provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee all the while avoiding adjudication of policy matters.

38 Thus, it seems to me that to replace "fundamental justice" with the term "natural justice" misses the mark entirely. It was, after all, clearly open to the legislator to use the term "natural justice", a known term of art, but such was not done. We must, as a general rule, be loath to exchange the terms actually used with terms so obviously avoided.

39 Whatever may have been the degree of synonymy between the two expressions in the past (which in any event has not been clearly demonstrated by the parties and intervenants), as of the last few decades this country has given a precise meaning to the words "natural justice" for the purpose of delineating the responsibility of adjudicators (in the wide sense of the word) in the field of administrative law.

40 It is, in my view, that precise and somewhat narrow meaning that the legislator avoided, clearly indicating thereby a will to give greater content to the words "principles of fundamental justice", the limits of which were left for the courts to develop but within, of course, the acceptable sphere of judicial activity.

4. Proceedings and evidence of the special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada

41 A number of courts have placed emphasis upon the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution in the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice", e.g., Latham v. Solicitor Gen. of Can., [1984] 2 F.C. 734, 39 C.R. (3d) 78, 5 Admin. L.R. 70, 12 C.C.C. (3d) 9, 10 C.R.R. 120, 9 D.L.R. (4th) 393 (T.D.); Re Mason and R. (1983), 43 O.R. (2d) 321, *(*sub nom. Re Mason; Mason v. R. in Right of Can.) 35 C.R. (3d) 393, 5 Admin. L.R. 16, 7 C.C.C. (3d) 426, 7 C.R.R. 293, 1 D.L.R. (4th) 712 (H.C.); and R. v. Holman (1982), 28 C.R. (3d) 378, 16 M.V.R. 225 (B.C. Prov. Ct.).

42 In particular, the following passages dealing with the testimony of federal civil servants from the Department of Justice have been relied upon:

43 Mr. Strayer (Assistant Deputy Minister, Public Law):

> Mr. Chairman, it was our belief that the words "fundamental justice" would cover the same thing as what is called procedural due process, that is the meaning of due process in relation to requiring fair procedure. However, it in our view does not cover the concept of what is called substantive due process, which would impose substantive requirements as to policy of the law in question.
>
> This has been most clearly demonstrated in the United States in the area of property, but also in other areas such as the right to life. The term due process has been given the broader concept of meaning both the procedure and substance. Natural justice or fundamental justice in our view does not go beyond the procedural requirements of fairness ...
>
> Mr. Strayer: The term "fundamental justice" appears to us to be essentially the same thing as natural justice.

Mr. Tassé (Deputy Minister) also said of the phrase "principles of fundamental justice" in testimony before the committee:

> We assume that the Court would look at that much like a Court would look at the requirements of natural justice, and the concept of natural justice is quite familiar to courts and they have given a good deal of specific meaning to the concept of natural justice. We would think that the Court would find in that phraseology principles of fundamental justice a meaning somewhat like natural justice or inherent fairness.
>
> Courts have been developing the concept of administrative fairness in recent years and they have been able to give a good deal of consideration, certainly to these sorts of concepts and we would expect they could do the same with this.

44 The Honourable Jean Chrétien, then federal Minister of Justice, also indicated to the committee that, while he thought "fundamental justice marginally more appropriate than natural justice" in s. 7, either term was acceptable to the government.

a) Admissibility

45 The first issue which arises is whether the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Joint Committee may even be considered admissible as extrinsic aids to the interpretation of Charter provisions. Such extrinsic materials were traditionally excluded from consideration in constitutional adjudication: e.g., Gosselin v. R. (1903), 33 S.C.R. 255 at 264, 7 C.C.C. 139 [Que.]; Ref. re Wartime Leasehold Regulations, [1950] S.C.R. 124, [1950] 2 D.L.R. 1.

46 In Ref. re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 297 at 317, *(*sub nom. Churchill Falls (Labrador) Corp. v. A.G. Nfld.) 8 D.L.R. (4th) 1, 47 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 125, 139 A.P.R. 125, 53 N.R. 268 (Nfld.), however, McIntyre J. stated that:

> The general exclusionary rule formerly considered to be applicable in dealing with the admissibility of extrinsic evidence in constitutional cases has been set aside or at least greatly modified and relaxed.

47 Indeed, in Re Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, 68 D.L.R. (3d) 452, 9 N.R. 541, Laskin C.J.C. stated, at p. 389:

> ... no general principle of admissibility or inadmissibility can or ought to be propounded by this Court, and ... the questions of resort to extrinsic evidence and what kind of extrinsic evidence may be admitted must depend on the constitutional issues on which it is sought adduce such evidence.

48 This approach was adopted by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Ref. re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714, 123 D.L.R. (3d) 554, 37 N.R. 158 [Ont.], and McIntyre J. in Ref. re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, in which he stated at p. 318:

> It will therefore be open to the Court in a proper case to receive and consider extrinsic evidence on the operation and effect of the legislation.

49 It is to be noted, however, that McIntyre J.'s remarks are in relation to the interpretation of the challenged statutory enactment rather than the interpretation of the Constitution itself. The same is true of the remarks of Laskin C.J.C. and Dickson J. (as he then was).

50 With respect to the interpretation of the Constitution, however, such extrinsic materials were considered, in at least two cases, by this court.

51 In the Re Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House Reference, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54, *(*sub nom. Ref. re Legislative Authority of Parliament to Alter or Replace the Senate)) 102 D.L.R. (3d) 1, 30 N.R. 271 (sub nom. Re B.N.A. Act and Fed. Senate), the court stated, at p. 66 [S.C.R.]:

> It is, we think, proper to consider the historical background which led to the provision which was made in the Act for the creation of the Senate as a part of the apparatus for the enactment of federal legislation. In the debates which occurred at the Quebec Conference in 1864, considerable time was occupied in discussing the provisions respecting the Senate. Its important purpose is stated in the following passages in speeches delivered in the debates on Confederation in the parliament of the province of Canada ...

52 The other case is A.G. Can. v. C.N. Tpt. Ltd., [1983] 2 S.C.R. 206, [1984] 1 W.W.R. 193, 28 Alta. L.R. (2d) 97, 38 C.R. (3d) 97, 7 C.C.C. (3d) 449, 76 C.P.R. (2d) 1, 3 D.L.R. (4th) 16, 49 A.R. 39, 49 N.R. 241. Laskin C.J.C., in that case, referred to the pre-Confederation debates in the course of interpreting ss. 91(27) and 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 (at p. 225).

53 I would adopt this approach when interpreting the Charter. Consequently, the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution should, in my view, be considered.

b) Weight

54 Having said that, however, I nonetheless believe that the logic underlying the reluctance to allow the use of materials such as speeches in Parliament carries considerable force with respect to the Minutes of the Committee as well.

55 In Ref. re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, McIntyre J. wrote at p. 319;

> ... I would say that the speeches and public declarations by prominent figures in the public and political life of Newfoundland on this question should not be received as evidence. They represent, no doubt, the considered views of the speakers at the time they were made, but cannot be said to be expressions of the intent of the Legislative Assembly.

56 Professor J. Magnet has written in "The Presumption of Constitutionality" (1980), 18 Osgoode Hall L.J. 87, pp. 99-100:

> In an administrative law setting, "The admissibility of ... [factual] evidence [on the issue of legislative intent] ... seems so clear as not to require authority ..."
>
> The transposition of the administrative law principle to a constitutional context is problematic. In the administrative law cases, the issue of intent concerns the intent of a specific person. In the constitutional cases, the issue of intent concerns the legislature, an incorporeal body made up of hundreds of persons. It may be said that such a body, like a corporation, is a legal fiction and has no intention in the relevant sense. It would follow that legislative intent, in the constitutional setting, is a hollow concept.
> Largely in consideration of this argument, Canadian courts have developed the rule that, in scrutinizing legislative intent for the purpose of determining constitutional validity, statements by members of the legislature during passage of the challenged Act are irrelevant and inadmissible. Several explanations of the rule have been put forward. Strayer has argued that the rule is sound because legislative motive is irrelevant to constitutional validity: "The essential factual issue here is that of effect ..." More convincingly, it has been argued that, considering the way in which the Canadian process of enactment differs from that of the United States, "Hansard gives no convincing proof of what the government intended ..."

> Moreover, by allowing ambiguities in the statute to be resolved by statements in the legislature, ministers would be given power in effect to legislate indirectly by making such statements. "Cabinets already have powers enough without having this added unto them."

57 If speeches and declarations by prominent figures are inherently unreliable (per McIntyre J. in Ref. re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, at p. 319) and "speeches made in the Legislature at the time of enactment of the measures are inadmissible as having little evidential weight" (per Dickson J. (as he then was) in Ref. re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, supra, at p. 721), the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Special Joint Committee, though admissible and granted somewhat more weight than speeches, should not be given too much weight. The inherent unreliability of such statements and speeches is not altered by the mere fact that they pertain to the Charter of Rights rather than a statute.

58 Moreover, the simple fact remains that the Charter is not the product of a few individual public servants, however distinguished, but of a multiplicity of individuals who played major roles in the negotiating, drafting and adoption of the Charter. How can one say with any confidence that within this enormous multiplicity of actors, without forgetting the role of the provinces, the comments of a few federal civil servants can in any way be determinative?

59 Were this court to accord any significant weight to this testimony, it would in effect be assuming a fact which is nearly impossible of proof, i.e., the intention of the legislative bodies which adopted the Charter. In view of the indeterminate nature of the data, it would in my view be erroneous to give these materials anything but minimal weight.

60 Another danger with casting the interpretation of s. 7 in terms of the comments made by those heard at the Joint Committee Proceedings is that, in so doing, the rights, freedoms and values embodied in the Charter in effect become frozen in time to the moment of adoption with little or no possibility of growth, development and adjustment to changing societal needs. Obviously, in the present case, given the proximity in time of the Charter debates, such a problem is relatively minor, even though it must be noted that even at this early stage in the life of the Charter, a host of issues and questions have been raised which were largely unforeseen at the time of such proceedings. If the newly planted "living tree" which is the Charter is to have the possibility of growth and adjustment over time, care must be taken to ensure that historical materials, such as the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee, do not stunt its growth. As Estey J. wrote in L.S.U.C. v. Skapinker, supra, at pp. 366-67:

> Narrow and technical interpretation, if not modulated by a sense of the unknowns of the future, can stunt the growth of the law and hence the community it serves. All this has long been with us in the process of developing the institutions of government under the B.N.A. Act, 1867 (now the Constitution Act, 1867). With the Constitution Act, 1982 comes a new dimension, a new yardstick of reconciliation between the individual and the community and their respective rights, a dimension which, like the balance of the Constitution, remains to be interpreted and applied by the Court.

5. The Canadian Bill of Rights

61 The appellant states that s. 7 "is a blend of s. 1(a) and s. 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights". Considerable emphasis is then placed upon the case of Duke v. R., [1972] S.C.R. 917, 18 C.R.N.S. 302, 7 C.C.C. (2d) 474, 28 D.L.R. (3d) 129 [Ont.], in which this court interpreted the words "principles of fundamental justice" in s. 2(e) of the Bill. Fauteux C.J.C. noted, at p. 923:

> Without attempting to formulate any final definition of those words, I would take them to mean, generally, that the tribunal which adjudicates upon his rights must act fairly, in good faith, without bias, and in a judicial temper, and must give to him the opportunity adequately to state his case.

62 However, as Le Dain J. has written in R. v. Therens, supra, with the implicit support of the majority, at p. 638:

63 In my opinion the premise that the framers of the Charter must be presumed to have intended that the words used by it should be given the meaning which had been given to them by judicial decisions at the time the Charter was enacted is not a reliable guide to its interpretation and application. By its very nature a constitutional charter of rights and freedoms must use general language which is capable of development and adaptation by the courts. And after at pp. 638-39:

> Although it is clear that in several instances, as in the case of s. 10, the framers of the Charter adopted the wording of the Canadian Bill of Rights, it is also clear that the Charter must be regarded, because of its constitutional character, as a new affirmation of rights and freedoms and of judicial power and responsibility in relation to their protection ...
> In considering the relationship of a decision under the Canadian Bill of Rights to an issue arising under the Charter, a court cannot, in my respectful opinion, avoid bearing in mind an evident fact of Canadian judicial history, which must be squarely and frankly faced: that on the whole, with some notable exceptions, the courts have felt some uncertainty or ambivalence in the application of the Canadian Bill of Rights because it did not reflect a clear constitutional mandate to make judicial decisions having the effect of limiting or qualifying the traditional sovereignty of parliament. The significance of the new constitutional mandate for judicial review provided by the Charter was emphasized by this Court in its recent decisions in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, and Hunter v. Southam, Inc., supra.

64 This view was also put forward by Wilson J. in her judgment in Singh v. Min. of Employment & Immigration, supra, with which Dickson C.J.C. and Lamer J. concurred, at p. 209:

> It seems to me rather that the recent adoption of the Charter by Parliament and nine of the ten provinces as part of the Canadian constitutional framework has sent a clear message to the courts that the restrictive attitude which at times characterized their approach to the Canadian Bill of Rights ought to be re-examined.

65 In any event, the Duke case is of little assistance in the interpretation of s. 7 of the Charter. Section 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights states:

> 2. Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to ...
> (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations ...

66 In s. 2(e) of the Bill of Rights, the words "principles of fundamental justice" were placed explicitly in the context of, and qualify, a "right to a fair hearing". Section 7 of the Charter does not create the same context. In s. 7, the words "principles of fundamental justice" are placed in the context of, and qualify, much more fundamental rights, the "right to life, liberty and security of the person". The distinction is important.

Conclusion

67 I have, in this judgment, undertaken a purposive analysis of the term "principles of fundamental justice" in s. 7 of the Charter in accordance with the method established by this court in Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra. Accordingly, the point of departure for the analysis has been a consideration of the general objectives of the Charter in the light of the general principles of Charter interpretation set forth in Skapinker and Southam, both supra. This was followed by a detailed analysis of the language and structure of the section as well as its immediate context within the Charter.

68 The main sources of support for the argument that "fundamental justice" is simply synonymous with natural justice have been the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights jurisprudence. In my view, neither the Minutes nor the Bill of Rights jurisprudence are persuasive or of any great force. The historical usage of the term "fundamental justice" is, on the other hand, shrouded in ambiguity. Moreover, not any one of these arguments, taken singly or as a whole, manages to overcome in my respectful view the textual and contextual analyses.

69 Consequently, my conclusion may be summarized as follows:

70 The term principles of fundamental justice is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right.

71 Sections 8-14 address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are therefore illustrative of the meaning, in criminal or penal law, of "principles of fundamental justice"; they represent principles which have been recognized by the common law, the international conventions and by the very fact of entrenchment in the Charter, as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and the rule of law.

72 Consequently, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets and principles, not only of our judicial process, but also of the other components of our legal system.

73 We should not be surprised to find that many of the principles of fundamental justice are procedural in nature. Our common law has largely been a law of remedies and procedures and, as Frankfurter J. wrote in McNabb v. U.S., 318 U.S. 332 at 347, 87 L. Ed. 819 (1942): "The history of liberty has largely been the history of observance of procedural safeguards". This is not to say, however, that the principles of fundamental justice are limited solely to procedural guarantees. Rather, the proper approach to the determination of the principles of fundamental justice is quite simply one in which, as Professor Tremblay has written, "future growth will be based on historical roots": (1984), 18 Univ. of B.C. L. Rev. 201, at p. 254.

74 Whether any given principle may be said to be a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 will rest upon an analysis of the nature, sources, rationale and essential role of that principle within the judicial process and in our legal system, as it evolves.

75 Consequently, those words cannot be given any exhaustive content or simple enumerative definition, but will take on concrete meaning as the courts address alleged violations of s. 7.

76 I now turn to such an analysis of the principle of mens rea and absolute liability offences in order to determine the question which has been put to the court in the present Reference.

Absolute Liability and Fundamental Justice In Penal Law

77 It has from time immemorial been part of our system of laws that the innocent not be punished. This principle has long been recognized as an essential element of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and on the rule of law. It is so old that its first enunciation was in Latin: actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.

78 As Glanville Williams said (Glanville Williams, Criminal Law, The General Part, 2nd ed. (1961), p. 30):

> There is no need here to go into the remote history of mens rea; suffice it to say that the requirement of a guilty state of mind (at least for the more serious crimes) had been developed by the time of Coke, which is as far back as the modern lawyer needs to go. "If one shoot at any wild fowl upon a tree, and the arrow killeth any reasonable creature afar off, without any evil intent in him, this is per infortunium."

79 One of the many judicial statements on the subject worth mentioning is of the highest authority, per Goddard C.J. in Harding v. Price, [1948] 1 K.B. 695 at 700, [1948] 1 All E.R. 283 (Div. Ct.), where he said:

> The general rule applicable to criminal cases is actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, and I venture to repeat what I said in Brend v. Wood [(1946), 62 T.L.R. 462, 463]: "It is of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a court should always bear in mind that, unless a statute either clearly or by necessary implication rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, the court should not find a man guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has a guilty mind.

80 This view has been adopted by this court in unmistakable terms in many cases, amongst which the better known are Beaver v. R., [1957] S.C.R. 531, 26 C.R. 193, 118 C.C.C. 129 [Ont.], and the most recent and often quoted judgment of Dickson J. (as he then was), writing for the court in R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, supra.

81 This court's decision in the latter case is predicated upon a certain number of postulates, one of which, given the nature of the rules it elaborates, has to be to the effect that absolute liability in penal law offends the principles of fundamental justice. Those principles are, to use the words of Dickson J. [at p. 1310], to the effect that "there is a generally held revulsion against punishment of the morally innocent." He also stated [at p. 1311] that the argument that absolute liability "violates fundamental principles of penal liability" was the most telling argument against absolute liability and one of greater force than those advanced in support thereof.

82 In my view it is because absolute liability offends the principles of fundamental justice that this court created presumptions against legislatures having intended to enact offences of a regulatory nature falling within that category. This is not to say, however, and to that extent I am in agreement with the Court of Appeal, that, as a result, absolute liability per se offends s. 7 of the Charter.

83 A law enacting an absolute liability offence will violate s. 7 of the Charter only if and to the extent that it has the potential of depriving of life, liberty, or security of the person.

84 Obviously, imprisonment (including probation orders) deprives persons of their liberty. An offence has that potential as of the moment it is open to the judge to impose imprisonment. There is no need that imprisonment, as in s. 94(2), be made mandatory.

85 I am therefore of the view that the combination of imprisonment and of absolute liability violates s. 7 of the Charter and can only be salvaged if the authorities demonstrate under s. 1 that such a deprivation of liberty in breach of those principles of fundamental justice is, in a free and democratic society, under the circumstances, a justified reasonable limit to one's rights under s. 7.

86 As no one has addressed imprisonment as an alternative to the non-payment of a fine, I prefer not to express any views in relation to s. 7 as regards that eventuality as a result of a conviction for an absolute liability offence; nor do I need to address here, given the scope of my finding and the nature of this appeal, minimum imprisonment, whether it offends the Charter per se or whether such violation, if any, is dependent upon whether it be for a mens rea or strict liability offence. Those issues were not addressed by the court below and it would be unwise to attempt to address them here. It is sufficient and desirable for this appeal to make the findings I have and no more, that is, that no imprisonment may be imposed for an absolute liability offence and, consequently, given the question put to us, an offence punishable by imprisonment cannot be an absolute liability offence.

87 Before considering s. 94(2) in the light of these findings, I feel we are, however, compelled to go somewhat further for the following reason. I would not want us to be taken by this conclusion as having inferentially decided that absolute liability may not offend s. 7 as long as imprisonment or probation orders are not available as a sentence. The answer to that question is dependent upon the content given to the words "security of the person". That issue was and is a live one. Indeed, though the question as framed focuses on absolute liability (s. 94(2)) in relation to the whole Charter, including the right to security of the person in s. 7, because of the presence of mandatory imprisonment in s. 94(1), only deprivation of liberty was considered. As the effect of imprisonment on the right to liberty is a foregone conclusion, a fortiori minimum imprisonment, everyone directed their arguments, when discussing s. 7, to considering whether absolute liability violated the principles of fundamental justice, and then subsidiarily argued pro or contra the effect of s. 1 of the Charter.

88 Counsel for those opposing the validity of s. 94(2) took the position in this court that absolute liability and severe punishment, always referring to imprisonment, violated s. 7 of the Charter. From the following passage of the judgment in the Court of Appeal [at p. 764] it would appear that counsel for those opposing the validity of the section took the wider position in that court that all absolute liability offences violated s. 7 because of "punishment of the morally innocent":

> In seeking to persuade the court to that conclusion counsel opposing the validity of s. 94(2) contended all absolute offences are now of no force and effect because of s. 7 of the Charter and that the provisions of s. 1 of the Charter should not be invoked to sustain them. In support of this submission counsel relied upon the view expressed by Dickson J. in Sault Ste. Marie that there was "a generally held revulsion against punishment of the morally innocent". They contended that, had the Charter been in effect when Sault Ste. Marie was decided, all absolute liability offences would have been struck down.
> We accept without hesitation the statement expressed by the learned justice but do not think it necessarily follows that because of s. 7 of the Charter this category of offence can no longer be legislated. To the contrary, there are, and will remain, certain public welfare offences, e.g., air and water pollution offences, where the public interest requires that the offences be absolute liability offences.

89 While I agree with the Court of Appeal, as I have already mentioned, that absolute liability does not per se violate s. 7 of the Charter, I am somewhat concerned with leaving without comment the unqualified reference by the Court of Appeal to the requirements of the "public interest".

90 If, by reference to public interest, it was meant that the requirements of public interest for certain types of offences is a factor to be considered in determining whether absolute liability offends the principles of fundamental justice, then I would respectfully disagree; if the public interest is there referred to by the court as a possible justification under s. 1 of a limitation to the rights protected at s. 7, then I do agree.

91 Indeed, as I said, in penal law, absolute liability always offends the principles of fundamental justice irrespective of the nature of the offence; it offends s. 7 of the Charter if, as a result, anyone is deprived of their life, liberty or security of the person, irrespective of the requirement of public interest. In such cases it might only be salvaged for reasons of public interest under s. 1.

92 In this latter regard, something might be added.

93 Administrative expediency, absolute liability's main supportive argument, will undoubtedly under s. 1 be invoked and occasionally succeed. Indeed, administrative expediency certainly has its place in administrative law. But when administrative law chooses to call in aid imprisonment through penal law, indeed sometimes criminal law and the added stigma attached to a conviction, exceptional, in my view, will be the case where the liberty or even the security of the person guaranteed under s. 7 should be sacrificed to administrative expediency. Section 1 may, for reasons of administrative expediency, successfully come to the rescue of an otherwise violation of s. 7, but only in cases arising out of exceptional conditions, such as natural disasters, the outbreak of war, epidemics, and the like.

94 Of course I understand the concern of many as regards corporate offences, specially, as was mentioned by the Court of Appeal, in certain sensitive areas such as the preservation of our vital environment and our natural resources. This concern might well be dispelled were it to be decided, given the proper case, that s. 7 affords protection to human persons only and does not extend to corporations.

95 Even if it be decided that s. 7 does extend to corporations, I think the balancing under s. 1 of the public interest against the financial interests of a corporation would give very different results from that of balancing public interest and the liberty or security of the person of a human being.

96 Indeed, the public interest as regards "air and water pollution offences" requires that the guilty be dealt with firmly, but the seriousness of the offence does not in my respectful view support the proposition that the innocent human person be open to conviction, quite the contrary.

Section 94(2)

97 No doubt s. 94(2) enacts in the clearest of terms an absolute liability offence, for the conviction for which a person will be deprived of his or her liberty, and little more, if anything, need be added. However, I should not want to conclude without addressing an argument raised by the appellant in this court and considered by the British Columbia Court of Appeal.

98 The appellant argues that, as a result of the case of R. v. MacDougall, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 605, 31 C.R. (3d) 1, 18 M.V.R. 180, 1 C.C.C. (3d) 65, 142 D.L.R. (3d) 216, 54 N.S.R. (2d) 562, 112 A.P.R. 562, 44 N.R. 560, s. 94(2) (the absolute liability provision) is of limited effect. Hence, the section raises "a false impression of a potential for wholesale injustice", says the appellant. In my view, this argument is of little relevance to the determination of this appeal. Whether the provision is of broad or of "limited" effect does not change its nature nor lead to a different characterization for the purpose of determining a violation of s. 7. The question is whether the provision offends s. 7 of the Charter at all, rather than whether it does so in "limited" or "wholesale" fashion. At best, this argument may be considered under s. 1.

99 The appellant summarizes the decision in MacDougall as establishing that:

> ... where an accused is charged with driving a motor vehicle while his licence was cancelled (contrary to a provincial statute), ignorance by the accused of the fact that his licence was revoked is ignorance of law and cannot provide the basis for an acquittal.

100 The respondent, however, distinguishes the MacDougall case from the case at bar on two grounds. First, the offence under consideration in MacDougall was one of strict liability rather than absolute liability. Secondly, while MacDougall:

> ... dealt only with a suspension by operation of law, s. 94(2) encompasses Court imposed suspensions (s. 90(2)), suspensions arising under the "old law" in the absence of the accused, and suspensions imposed by administrative review by the Superintendent of Motor Vehicles requiring delivery of notice ("old" act, Section 82(3)).

Thus, the respondent concludes that there are:

> ... at least three classes of morally innocent persons who are, by section 94(2) deprived of the opportunity to present a defence of the type outlined by Dickson J. in R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, supra, at p. 1326:
>
> > The defence will be available if the accused reasonably believed in a mistaken set of facts which, if true, would render the act or omission innocent, or if he took all reasonable steps to avoid the particular event.

101 In the final analysis, it seems that both the appellant and the respondent agree that s. 94 will impact upon the right to liberty of a limited number of morally innocent persons. It creates an absolute liability offence which effects a deprivation of liberty for a limited number of persons. To me, that is sufficient for it to be in violation of s. 7.

Section 1

102 Having found that s. 94(2) offends s. 7 of the Charter, there remains the question as to whether the appellants have demonstrated that the section is salvaged by the operation of s. 1 of the Charter. No evidence was adduced in the Court of Appeal or in this court. The position in that regard and the argument in support of the operability of s. 94(2) is as follows in appellant's factum:

> If this Court rules that s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act is inconsistent with S. 7 (or S. 11(d)) of the Charter, then it is submitted that S. 1 of the Charter is applicable. It is submitted that Laskin J. (as he then was) made it clear in Curr v. The Queen, supra, that it is within the scope of judicial notice for this Court to recognize that a statutory provision was enacted as part of a legislative scheme aimed at reducing the human and economic cost of bad driving. S. 94 is but part of the overall scheme laid out in the Motor Vehicle Act by which the Legislature is attempting to get bad drivers off the road. S. 94 imposes severe penalties on those who drive while prohibited from driving and those who drive while their driver's licence is suspended.
> It is submitted that if S. 94(2) is inconsistent with one of the above-noted provisions of the Charter, then S. 94(2) contains a "reasonable limit, etc." within the meaning of S. 1 of the Charter.

103 I do not take issue with the fact that it is highly desirable that "bad drivers" be kept off the road. I do not take issue either with the desirability of punishing severely bad drivers who are in contempt of prohibitions against driving. The bottom line of the question to be addressed here is: whether the government of British Columbia has demonstrated as justifiable that the risk of imprisonment of a few innocent is, given the desirability of ridding the roads of British Columbia of bad drivers, a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society. That result is to be measured against the offence being one of strict liability open to a defence of due diligence, the success of which does nothing more than let those few who did nothing wrong remain free.

104 As did the Court of Appeal, I find that this demonstration has not been satisfied, indeed, not in the least.

105 In the result, I would dismiss the appeal and answer the question in the negative, as did the Court of Appeal, albeit for somewhat different reasons, and declare s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, as amended by the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982, inconsistent with s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

106 Having come to this conclusion, I choose, as did the Court of Appeal, not to address whether the section violates the rights guaranteed under ss. 11(d) and 12 of the Charter.

Wilson J.*:

107 I agree with my colleague, Lamer J., that s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act violates s. 7 of the Charter and is not saved by s. 1 [appeal from case reported at 42 B.C.L.R. 364, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 756, 33 C.R. (3d) 22, 19 M.V.R. 63, 4 C.C.C. (3d) 243, 5 C.R.R. 148, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 539]. I reach that result, however, by a somewhat different route.

108 I start with a consideration of statutory "offences". These are divisible into offences for which mens rea is required and those for which it is not. Statutory offences are subject to a presumption in favour of a mens rea requirement as a matter of interpretation, but the courts have increasingly come to accept the proposition that legislatures may create non mens rea offences provided they make it clear that the actus reus itself is prohibited. This is typically so in the case of the so-called "regulatory" or "public welfare" offences. There is no moral delinquency involved in these offences. They are simply designed to regulate conduct in the public interest.

109 Two questions, therefore, have to be answered on this appeal. The first is: do absolute liability offences created by statute per se offend the Charter? The second is: assuming they do not, can they be attended by mandatory imprisonment or can such a sanction only be attached to true mens rea offences? Certainly, in the absence of the Charter, legislatures are free to create absolute liability offences and to attach to them any sanctions they please. Does s. 7 of the Charter circumscribe their power in this regard?

1. Absolute liability offences

110 Section 7 affirms the right to life, liberty and security of the person while at the same time indicating that a person may be deprived of such a right if the deprivation is effected "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". I do not view the latter part of the section as a qualification on the right to life, liberty and security of the person in the sense that it limits or modifies that right or defines its parameters. Its purpose seems to me to be the very opposite, namely, to protect the right against deprivation or impairment unless such deprivation or impairment is effected in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

111 Section 7 does not, however, affirm a right to the principles of fundamental justice per se. There must first be found an impairment of the right to life, liberty or security of the person. It must then be determined whether that impairment has been effected in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If it has, it passes the threshold test in s. 7 itself but the court must go on to consider whether it can be sustained under s. 1 as a limit prescribed by law on the s. 7 right which is both reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society. If, however, the limit on the s. 7 right has been effected through a violation of the principles of fundamental justice, the inquiry, in my view, ends there and the limit cannot be sustained under s. 1. I say this because I do not believe that a limit on the s. 7 right which has been imposed in violation of the principles of fundamental justice can be either "reasonable" or "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". The requirement in s. 7 that the principles of fundamental justice be observed seems to me to restrict the legislature's power to impose limits on the s. 7 right under s. 1. It can only limit the s. 7 right if it does so in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice and, even if it meets that test, it still has to meet the tests in s. 1.

112 Assuming that I am correct in my analysis of s. 7 and its relationship to s. 1, an absolute liability offence cannot violate s. 7 unless it impairs the right to life, liberty or security of the person. It cannot violate s. 7 because it offends the principles of fundamental justice because they are not protected by s. 7 absent an impairment of the s. 7 right. Leaving aside for the moment the mandatory imprisonment sanction, I cannot find an interference with life, liberty or security of the person in s. 94 of the Motor Vehicle Act. It is true that the section prevents citizens from driving their vehicles when their licences are suspended. Citizens are also prevented from driving on the wrong side of the road. Indeed, all regulatory offences impose some restriction on liberty broadly construed. But I think it would trivialize the Charter to sweep all those offences into s. 7 as violations of the right to life, liberty and security of the person even if they can be sustained under s. 1. It would be my view, therefore, that absolute liability offences of this type do not per se offend s. 7 of the Charter.

2. Absolute liability plus mandatory imprisonment

113 The real question, as I see it, is whether s. 7 of the Charter is violated by the attachment of a mandatory imprisonment sanction to an absolute liability offence. Clearly a s. 7 right is interfered with here in that a person convicted of such an offence automatically loses his liberty.

114 In what circumstances then may the citizen be deprived of his right to liberty? Clearly not if he was deprived of it through a process which was procedurally unfair. But is s. 7 limited to that?

115 I would assume that one of the reasons for the rider attached to the right to liberty affirmed in s. 7 is to accommodate the criminal justice system. It will be through the criminal justice system that citizens will typically lose their liberty at the hands of government. The system must not, therefore, cause them to lose their liberty in violation of the principles of fundamental justice. The system must reflect those principles and the validity of the penal provisions must be assessed in relation to them.

116 Since s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act imposes a limit prescribed by law on the s. 7 right, we must determine whether fundamental justice is offended by attaching mandatory imprisonment to an absolute liability offence. Given that we can have statutory non mens rea offences, what is repugnant to fundamental justice in imprisoning someone for their commission?

117 At common law imprisonment was reserved for the more serious mens rea offences. However, we are dealing here with statutory offences and the legislation must stand unless it violates s. 7. We cannot, in my view, simply state as a bald proposition that absolute liability and imprisonment cannot co-exist in a statutory context. Legislatures can supersede the common law. The legislature may consider it so important to prevent a particular act from being committed that it absolutely forbids it and, if it is committed, may subject the offender to a penalty whether he has any mens rea or not and whether or not he had any intention of breaking the law. Prior to the Charter such legislation would have been unassailable. Now it must meet the test of s. 7. Where the legislature has imposed a penalty in the form of mandatory imprisonment for the commission of an absolute liability offence and has done so in clear and unambiguous language, can the legislation survive an attack under s. 7? It is suggested that such legislation cannot survive because it offends the principles of fundamental justice and, in particular, the principle that punishment is inappropriate in the absence of moral culpability.

118 The common law distinguished sharply the conduct of the wrongdoer from his state of mind at the time. Hence the famous maxim referred to by my colleague — actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. The important thing to note, however, is that while the maxim has always been viewed as identifying the essential ingredients of a crime at common law, its meaning has been subject to a process of historical and juridical development, particularly the concept of mens rea. In the earliest beginnings of criminal liability the mental state of the wrongdoer was not considered at all; it was enough that he had done the fell deed: see Holdsworth, A History of English Law, 3rd ed. (1923), vol. II, p. 50 et seq. At a later stage the accused's state of mind was considered for two distinct purposes, namely (1) to determine whether his conduct was voluntary or involuntary; and (2) to determine whether he realized what the consequences of his conduct might be. But the first purpose was viewed as the key one. It was considerably later in the development of the law of criminal responsibility that the emphasis changed and an appreciation of the consequences of his act became the central focus. The movement towards the concept of the "guilty mind" was not, however, a sudden or dramatic one. This is understandable. The judges of the day found the new rule hard to apply because it was difficult to look into the state of a man's mind. The ecclesiastical authorities, however, had no such problem and legal historians seem to agree that the ecclesiastical influence was largely responsible for moving the focus to the mental element in common law crime: see Holdsworth, p. 259.

119 The introduction of concepts of morality into criminal responsibility inevitably led to a sharp distinction between crimes which were mala in se and crimes which were merely mala prohibita. Blackstone describes crimes which were mala in se as offences against "those rights which God and nature have established" (Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, 17th ed. (1830), by E. Christian, p. 53) and crimes which were mala prohibita as breaches of "those laws which enjoin only positive duties, and forbid any such things as are not mala in se ... without any intermixture of moral guilt" (Blackstone, p. 57). This distinction is now pretty well discredited: see Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 30th ed. (1938), p. 900; Allen, Legal Duties (1931), p. 239. While it is undoubtedly a fact that certain crimes evoke feelings of revulsion and condemnation in the minds of most people, those feelings are now generally perceived as dependent upon a number of variable factors such as environment, education and religious prejudice and are no longer seen as providing a secure basis for the segregation of crimes into two different categories. Quoting from Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law (1952), ed. J.W.C. Turner, at pp. 22-23:

> Among the members of any community at a given period, certain offences are by general agreement regarded as especially serious and excite deep moral reprobation, whereas other transgressions are regarded as venial and are more or less condoned, especially when they infringe rules of law which are unpopular. It is indeed inevitable that this apportionment of blame should be made. Yet the vague and fluctuating line which in everyday life is drawn between the one group and the other only marks a variation in degree; it is not a boundary which separates things fundamentally alien in kind. Ethical reprobation of homicide, homosexuality, libel, adultery, bigamy and slave trading, to take a few examples, is not the same in all countries, and indeed may vary from section to section of the people in the same country ...
> This defective classification of crimes clearly formed an unsound premise from which to draw any jurisprudential conclusion but it has an insidious attraction, and in the form of English phrases such as "in itself unlawful" it has penetrated into one or two modern judgments with vitiating effects upon the logic and clarity of the argument.

120 Accepting that a guilty mind was an essential ingredient of a crime at common law, it does not, of course, follow that the same is true of a "crime" created by statute. I have already referred to the presumption against absolute liability as a matter of statutory interpretation. This undoubtedly reflects the common law approach to the nature of crime. It is, however, only a presumption. Provided it does so in clear and unambiguous terms, the legislature is free to make a person liable for the actus reus with or without mens rea.

121 In Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law, p. 4, the author highlights the difficulty in identifying any essential characteristics of crimes created by statute. He points out that such crimes originate in the government policy of the day and that, so long as crimes continue to be created by government policy, the nature of statutory crime will elude definition. Lord Atkin adverted to the same difficulty in Proprietary Articles Trade Assn. v. A.G. Can.; Re Combines Investigation Act and S. 498 Criminal Code, [1931] A.C. 310, [1931] 1 W.W.R. 552, 55 C.C.C. 241, [1931] 2 D.L.R. 1 (P.C.). He stated at p. 324:

> ... the domain of criminal jurisprudence can only be ascertained by examining what acts at any particular period are declared by the State to be crimes, and the only common nature they will be found to possess is that they are prohibited by the State and that those who commit them are punished.

122 In R. v. Pierce Fisheries Ltd., [1971] S.C.R. 5, 12 C.R.N.S. 272, [1970] 5 C.C.C. 193, 12 D.L.R. (3d) 591 [N.S.], Ritchie J., speaking for the majority of this court, said at p. 199:

> Generally speaking, there is a presumption at common law that mens rea is an essential ingredient of all cases that are criminal in the true sense, but a consideration of a considerable body of case law on the subject satisfies me that there is a wide category of offences created by statutes enacted for the regulation of individual conduct in the interests of health, convenience, safety, and the general welfare of the public which are not subject to any such presumption.

123 There seems to be no doubt that in s. 94 of the Motor Vehicle Act the legislature of British Columbia has created such an offence. Subsection (2) expressly precludes the application of any presumption in favour of a mens rea requirement. However, as already indicated, I do not believe that any principle of fundamental justice is offended by the creation of an absolute liability offence absent an impairment of the s. 7 right.

124 Is fundamental justice offended then by the attachment of a mandatory term of imprisonment to the s. 94 offence? Is there something repugnant about imprisoning a person for the commission of an absolute liability offence? Presumably no objection can be taken to attaching penal consequences such as a fine to a validly enacted absolute liability offence, only to penal consequences in the form of imprisonment if this gives rise to a violation of s. 7 of the Charter. If it does, then the court is not only empowered, but obligated by the Constitution, to strike the section down.

125 I have already indicated that in my view a law which interferes with the liberty of the citizen in violation of the principles of fundamental justice cannot be saved by s. 1 as being either reasonable or justified. The concepts are mutually exclusive. This is not, of course, to say that no limits can be put upon the right to life, liberty and security of the person. They clearly can, but only if they are imposed in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice and survive the tests in s. 1 as being reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society. Nor is the government precluded from resort to s. 33 of the Charter in order to dispense with the requirements of fundamental justice when, in a case of emergency, it seeks to impose restrictions on the s. 7 right. This, however, will be a policy decision for which the government concerned will be politically accountable to the people. As it is, s. 94 cannot, in my view, be saved by s. 1 if it violates s. 7. The sole question is whether it violates s. 7.

126 My colleague, in finding that s. 94 offends the principles of fundamental justice, has relied heavily upon the common law which precluded punishment in the absence of a guilty mind. We are not, however, dealing with a common law crime here. We are dealing with a statutory offence as to which the legislature has stated in no uncertain terms that guilt is established by proof of the act itself.

127 Unlike my colleague, I do not think that ss. 8-14 of the Charter shed much light on the interpretation of the phrase "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" as used in s. 7. I find them very helpful as illustrating facets of the right to life, liberty and security of the person. I am not ready at this point, however, to equate unreasonableness or arbitrariness or tardiness as used in some of these sections with a violation of the principles of fundamental justice as used in s. 7. Delay, for example, may be explained away or excused or justified on a number of grounds under s. 1. I prefer, therefore, to treat these sections as self-standing provisions, as indeed they are.

128 I approach the interpretative problem raised by the phrase "the principles of fundamental justice" on the assumption that the legislature was very familiar with the concepts of "natural justice" and "due process" and the way in which those phrases had been judicially construed and applied. Yet they chose neither. Instead they chose the phrase "the principles of fundamental justice". What is "fundamental justice"? We know what "fundamental principles" are. They are the basic, bedrock principles that underpin a system. What would "fundamental principles of justice" mean? And would it mean something different from "principles of fundamental justice"? I am not entirely sure. We have been left by the legislature with a conundrum. I would conclude, however, that if the citizen is to be guaranteed his right to life, liberty and security of the person — surely one of the most basic rights in a free and democratic society — then he certainly should not be deprived of it by means of a violation of a fundamental tenet of our justice system.

129 It has been argued very forcefully that s. 7 is concerned only with procedural injustice but I have difficulty with that proposition. There is absolutely nothing in the section to support such a limited construction. Indeed, it is hard to see why one's life and liberty should be protected against procedural injustice and not against substantive injustice in a Charter that opens with the declaration:

> Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law: ...
>
> and sets out the guarantee in broad and general terms as follows:
> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

I cannot think that the guaranteed right in s. 7 which is to be subject only to limits which are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society can be taken away by the violation of a principle considered fundamental to our justice system. Certainly the rule of law acknowledged in the preamble as one of the foundations on which our society is built is more than mere procedure. It will be for the courts to determine the principles which fall under the rubric "the principles of fundamental justice". Obviously not all principles of law are covered by the phrase; only those which are basic to our system of justice.

130 I have grave doubts that the dichotomy between substance and procedure which may have served a useful purpose in other areas of the law such as administrative law and private international law should be imported into s. 7 of the Charter. In many instances the line between substance and procedure is a very narrow one. For example, the presumption of innocence protected in s. 11(d) of the Charter may be viewed as a substantive principle of fundamental justice but it clearly has both a substantive and a procedural aspect. Indeed, any rebuttable presumption of fact may be viewed as procedural, as going primarily to the allocation of the burden of proof. Nevertheless, there is also an interest of substance to be protected by the presumption, namely, the right of an accused to be treated as innocent until proved otherwise by the Crown. This right has both a societal and an individual aspect and is clearly fundamental to our justice system. I see no particular virtue in isolating its procedural from its substantive elements or vice versa for purposes of s. 7. A similar analysis may be made of the rule against double jeopardy protected in s. 11(h).

131 How then are we to decide whether attaching a mandatory term of imprisonment to an absolute liability offence created by statute offends a principle of fundamental justice? I believe we must turn to the theory of punishment for the answer.

3. Punishment and fundamental justice

132 It is now generally accepted among penologists that there are five main objectives of a penal system: see Nigel Walker, Sentencing in a Rational Society (1969). They are:

> 1) to protect offenders and suspected offenders against unofficial retaliation;
>
> 2) to reduce the incidence of crime;
>
> 3) to ensure that offenders atone for their offences;
>
> 4) to keep punishment to the minimum necessary to achieve the objectives of the system; and
> 5) to express society's abhorrence of crime.

Apart from death, imprisonment is the most severe sentence imposed by the law and is generally viewed as a last resort, i.e., as appropriate only when it can be shown that no other sanction can achieve the objectives of the system.

133 The Law Reform Commission of Canada in its Working Paper 11, "Imprisonment and Release" (Studies on Imprisonment (1976)), states at p. 10:

> Justice requires that the sanction of imprisonment not be disproportionate to the offence, and humanity dictates that it must not be heavier than necessary to achieve its objective.

134 Because of the absolute liability nature of the offence created by s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, a person can be convicted under the section even although he was unaware at the time he was driving that his licence was suspended and was unable to find this out despite the exercise of due diligence. While the legislature may as a matter of government policy make this an offence, and we cannot question its wisdom in this regard, the question is whether it can make it mandatory for the courts to deprive a person convicted of it of his liberty without violating s. 7. This, in turn, depends on whether attaching a mandatory term of imprisonment to an absolute liability offence such as this violates the principles of fundamental justice. I believe that it does. I think the conscience of the court would be shocked and the administration of justice brought into disrepute by such an unreasonable and extravagant penalty. It is totally disproportionate to the offence and quite incompatible with the objective of a penal system referred to in para. (4) above.

135 It is basic to any theory of punishment that the sentence imposed bear some relationship to the offence; it must be a "fit" sentence proportionate to the seriousness of the offence. Only if this is so can the public be satisfied that the offender "deserved" the punishment he received and feel a confidence in the fairness and rationality of the system. This is not to say that there is an inherently appropriate relationship between a particular offence and its punishment but rather that there is a scale of offences and punishments into which the particular offence and punishment must fit. Obviously this cannot be done with mathematical precision and many different factors will go into the assessment of the seriousness of a particular offence for purposes of determining the appropriate punishment, but it does provide a workable conventional framework for sentencing. Indeed, judges in the exercise of their sentencing discretion have been employing such a scale for over a hundred years.

136 I believe that a mandatory term of imprisonment for an offence committed unknowingly and unwittingly and after the exercise of due diligence is grossly excessive and inhumane. It is not required to reduce the incidence of the offence. It is beyond anything required to satisfy the need for "atonement". And society, in my opinion, would not be abhorred by an unintentional and unknowing violation of the section. I believe, therefore, that such a sanction offends the principles of fundamental justice embodied in our penal system Section 94(2) is accordingly inconsistent with s. 7 of the Charter and must, to the extent of the inconsistency, be declared of no force and effect under s. 52. I express no view as to whether a mandatory term of imprisonment for such an offence represents an arbitrary imprisonment within the meaning of s. 9 of the Charter or "cruel and unusual treatment or punishment" within the meaning of s. 12 because it is not necessary to decide those issues in order to answer the constitutional question posed.

137 I would dismiss the appeal and answer the constitutional question in the negative.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Life, liberty and security of person [s. 7] — Miscellaneous

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — Court of Appeal reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" into provision barring living off avails of prostitution — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — Basic values under s. 7 of Charter in present case were against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — Question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of person has been denied by law that is inherently bad — Grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on just one person is sufficient to establish breach of s. 7 — Prohibitions at issue do not merely impose conditions on how sex trade workers operate: by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution, they prevent people engaged in risky but legal activity from taking steps to protect themselves from risks — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Life, liberty and security of person [s. 7] — Principles of fundamental justice — Overbreadth

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — Court of Appeal agreed that prohibition against living off avails was overly broad but reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — As found by courts below, living on avails provision is overbroad — Law punishes everyone who lives on avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit sex trade workers, such as pimps, and those who could increase their safety and security, such as drivers, receptionists or security personnel — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Offences — Prostitution and related offences — Living on avails of prostitution — Miscellaneous

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — Court of Appeal agreed that prohibition against living off avails was overly broad but reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — As found by courts below, living on avails provision is overbroad — Law punishes everyone who lives on avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit sex trade workers, such as pimps, and those who could increase their safety and security, such as drivers, receptionists or security personnel — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Offences — Prostitution and related offences — Soliciting — Miscellaneous

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Provisions included prohibition on communication in public place under s. 213(1)(c) of Code, which made face-to-face communication illegal — Application judge found that face-to-face communication was "essential tool" in reducing risks sex trade workers face by allowing them to screen prospective clients — Application judge also found that making it illegal had effect of displacing sex trade workers from familiar areas to more isolated areas, thereby making them more vulnerable — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal also upheld finding against bawdy-house provision but reversed application judge's finding in part by narrowing provision by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — Application judge correctly concluded that prohibition of such communication sufficed to engage security of person under s. 7 of Charter — Majority of Court of Appeal wrongly attributed errors in reasoning to application judge, who had concluded that s. 213(1)(c) was grossly disproportionate response to possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Offences — Bawdy-house offences — Keeping common bawdy-house — Keeping

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, as well as living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application judge found, on balance of probabilities, that safest form of prostitution was working independently from fixed location — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — However, Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation and reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" into provision barring living off avails of prostitution — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — As was held by lower courts, objectives of bawdy-house provision are to combat neighbourhood disruption or disorder and to safeguard public health and safety — Negative impact of bawdy-house prohibition on respondents' security of person is grossly disproportionate to its objective — Harms identified by courts below are grossly disproportionate to deterrence of community disruption that is object of law — By imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution, prohibition prevents people engaged in risky but legal activity from taking steps to protect themselves from risks — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Charter remedies [s. 24] — Declaration of invalidity

Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — Court of Appeal reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" into provision barring living off avails of prostitution — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — Basic values under s. 7 of Charter in present case were against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — Question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of person has been denied by law that is inherently bad — Grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on just one person is sufficient to establish breach of s. 7 — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter and were not saved by s. 1 — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Criminal law --- Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Charter remedies [s. 24] — Reading in Criminal Code of Canada contained provisions that created offences barring keeping common bawdy-house, living off avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that application judge erred in holding that provision barring "soliciting" constituted s. 7 Charter violation — Court of Appeal upheld finding against bawdy-house provision — Court of Appeal agreed that prohibition against living off avails was overly broad but reversed application judge's finding in part by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — As found by courts below, living on avails provision is overbroad — Law punishes everyone who lives on avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit sex trade workers, such as pimps, and those who could increase their safety and security, such as drivers, receptionists or security personnel — Prohibitions engaged s. 7 of Charter — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Judges and courts --- Stare decisis — Obiter dicta — Of Supreme Court of Canada

In 1990, Supreme Court of Canada held in Prostitution Reference that certain prostitution-related criminal offences, including keeping common bawdy-house, living off of avails of prostitution and communication ("soliciting") for purpose of prostitution, did not violate s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Majority judgment in Prostitution Reference considered s. 7 solely in context of "physical liberty" — Current and former sex trade workers brought application for declaration that these provisions were in violation of s. 2(b) and s. 7 of Charter — Application was granted and provisions were struck down — Crown brought appeal that was allowed in part — Court of Appeal held that trial judge asking to depart from precedent on basis of new evidence, or new social, political or economic assumptions, may make findings of fact for consideration by higher courts, but cannot apply them to arrive at different conclusion from previous precedent — Crown brought appeals against finding on bawdy-house prohibition; sex trade workers cross-appealed on soliciting provision and reading-in remedy — Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed — While reference opinions may not be legally binding, in practice they have been followed — Supreme Court of Canada's advisory opinion upholding constitutionality of prohibitions on bawdy-houses and communicating was based on physical liberty interest under s. 7, not security of person — Principles of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality raised in case at bar were developed only in past twenty years: arguments based on Charter provisions that were not raised in earlier case constituted new legal issue — As well, common law principle of stare decisis is subordinate to Constitution and cannot require court to uphold law that is unconstitutional — Prohibitions were declared to be inconsistent with Charter and hence void — Declaration of invalidity suspended for one year.

Droit criminel --- Charte des droits et libertés — Vie, liberté et sécurité de la personne [art. 7] — Divers

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Cour d'appel a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant la disposition sur le proxénétisme comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Valeurs fondamentales qui sous-tendent l'art. 7 dans le présent dossier s'opposaient à l'arbitraire, à la portée excessive et à la disproportion totale — Question que commande l'art. 7 est celle de savoir si une disposition législative intrinsèquement mauvaise prive qui que ce soit du droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne — Effet totalement disproportionné, excessif ou arbitraire sur une seule personne suffit pour établir l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7 — Législateur ne se contente pas d'encadrer la pratique de la prostitution : en imposant des conditions dangereuses à la pratique de la prostitution, les interdictions empêchent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, de prendre des mesures pour assurer leur propre protection contre les risques ainsi courus — Interdictions mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Charte des droits et libertés — Vie, liberté et sécurité de la personne [art. 7] — Principes de justice fondamentale — Portée excessive

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Cour d'appel convenait que l'interdiction concernant le proxénétisme avait une portée trop large, mais a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant cette disposition comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Comme l'estimaient les juridictions inférieures, la portée de la disposition sur le proxénétisme est excessive — Disposition sanctionne quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans que ne soit établie de distinction entre celui qui exploite une prostituée, tel un proxénète, et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'une prostituée, tel un chauffeur, un réceptionniste ou un préposé à sa sécurité — Interdictions mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Infractions — Prostitution et infractions liées — Vivre des produits de la prostitution — Divers sanctionne quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans que ne soit établie de distinction entre celui qui exploite une prostituée, tel un proxénète, et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'une prostituée, tel un chauffeur, un réceptionniste ou un préposé à sa sécurité — Interdictions mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Infractions — Prostitution et infractions liées — Sollicitation — Divers

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Parmi les dispositions visées, il y avait l'art. 213(1)c) du Code interdisant la communication en public, qui faisait en sorte que la communication entre les intéressés ne soit pas légale — Juge de première instance a conclu que la communication entre les intéressés était [TRADUCTION] « essentielle » à l'accroissement de la sécurité des travailleurs du sexe en permettant aux travailleurs du sexe de jauger leurs clients éventuels — Juge de première instance a également conclu que le fait de rendre la communication illégale avait pour effet de faire migrer les travailleurs du sexe vers des lieux isolés, ce qui les rendait plus vulnérables — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a également confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, mais a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant une disposition comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure que l'interdiction de telles communications suffisait pour mettre en jeu la sécurité de personne en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte — Juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont relevé à tort des erreurs dans le raisonnement de la juge de première instance, laquelle avait conclu que l'art. 213(1)c) constituait une réaction totalement disproportionnée au risque de nuisance causée par la prostitution de rue — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Infractions — Infractions concernant des maisons de débauche — Tenir une maison de débauche — Tenir les lieux

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Juge de première instance a conclu, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, que la forme de prostitution la plus sûre était celle qui se pratique de façon autonome dans un même lieu — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Toutefois, la Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte et a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant la disposition portant sur le proxénétisme comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Comme l'estimaient les juridictions inférieures, l'objectif de la disposition sur les maisons de débauche est de lutter contre les troubles de voisinage et de protéger la santé et la sécurité publiques — Effet préjudiciable de l'interdiction de tenir des maisons de débauche sur la sécurité des demanderesses est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif poursuivi — Préjudices relevés par les juridictions inférieures sont totalement disproportionnés à l'objectif de réprimer le désordre public — En imposant des conditions dangereuses à la pratique de la prostitution, les interdictions empêchent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, de prendre des mesures pour assurer leur propre protection contre les risques ainsi courus — Interdictions

mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Charte des droits et libertés — Réparations en vertu de la Charte [art. 24] — Déclaration d'invalidité

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Cour d'appel convenait que l'interdiction concernant le proxénétisme avait une portée trop large, mais a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant cette disposition comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Valeurs fondamentales qui sous-tendent l'art. 7 dans le présent dossier s'opposaient à l'arbitraire, à la portée excessive et à la disproportion totale — Question que commande l'art. 7 est celle de savoir si une disposition législative intrinsèquement mauvaise prive qui que ce soit du droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne — Effet totalement disproportionné, excessif ou arbitraire sur une seule personne suffit pour établir l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7 — Interdictions mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte et ne pouvaient pas être sauvegardées par application de l'article premier — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Charte des droits et libertés — Réparations en vertu de la Charte [art. 24] — Interpréter une disposition comme si certains mots s'y trouvaient

Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Cour d'appel convenait que l'interdiction concernant le proxénétisme avait une portée trop large, mais a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant cette disposition comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Comme l'estimaient les juridictions inférieures, la portée de la disposition sur le proxénétisme est excessive — Disposition sanctionne quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans que ne soit établie de distinction entre celui qui exploite une prostituée, tel un proxénète, et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'une prostituée, tel un chauffeur, un réceptionniste ou un préposé à sa sécurité — Interdictions mettaient en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Juges et tribunaux --- Stare decisis — Obiter dicta — De la Cour suprême du Canada

En 1990, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, la Cour suprême du Canada a estimé que certaines infractions criminelles relatives à la prostitution, notamment l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution ne contrevenaient pas à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Juges majoritaires, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, ont interprété l'art. 7 uniquement dans le contexte de la « liberté physique » — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 2b) et à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a conclu que le tribunal de première instance invité à rompre avec un précédent en raison de nouveaux éléments de preuve ou de nouvelles données sociales, politiques ou économiques peut tirer des conclusions de fait susceptibles d'être examinées ensuite par une juridiction supérieure, mais ne peut les appliquer pour arriver à une solution différente de celle retenue dans le précédent — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Bien que les avis consultatifs puissent ne pas être juridiquement contraignants, dans les faits, il sont suivis — Dans l'avis consultatif de la Cour suprême du Canada confirmant la constitutionnalité des interdictions de tenir une maison de débauche et de communiquer à des fins de prostitution, les juges statuaient en fonction du droit à la liberté physique de la personne garanti à l'art. 7, et non en fonction de la sécurité de la personne — Principes soulevés en l'espèce concernant le caractère arbitraire, la portée excessive et la disproportion totale des dispositions contestées n'ont été développés qu'au cours des vingt dernières années : les prétentions d'ordre constitutionnel qui n'ont pas été invoquées dans l'affaire antérieure constituaient de nouvelles questions de droit — Aussi, la règle du stare decisis issue de la common law est subordonnée à la Constitution et ne saurait avoir pour effet d'obliger un tribunal à valider une loi inconstitutionnelle — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Juges et tribunaux --- Compétence — Cours supérieures — Cour d'appel — Divers

Déférence — Dispositions du Code criminel canadien créaient des infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche, de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui et à la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution — Travailleuses du sexe actives et retraitées ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que ces dispositions contrevenaient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés — Requête a été accordée et les dispositions ont été annulées — Appel interjeté par le ministère public a été accueilli en partie — Cour d'appel a estimé que les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs ne commandaient pas la déférence — Cour d'appel a conclu que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en concluant que la disposition portant sur la sollicitation contrevenait à l'art. 7 de la Charte — Cour d'appel a confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche — Cour d'appel a infirmé en partie la conclusion de la juge de première instance en interprétant la disposition interdisant le proxénétisme comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés — Ministère public a formé des pourvois à l'encontre des conclusions sur l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche; les travailleuses du sexe ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la disposition relative à la sollicitation et sur la mesure de réparation ayant pour effet d'interpréter une disposition en y ajoutant des mots qui ne s'y trouvent pas — Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli — Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en concluant que les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs ne commandaient pas la déférence — Appliquer une norme de contrôle aux faits en litige ainsi qu'à la crédibilité des témoins et en appliquer une autre aux faits sociaux ou législatifs revient à demander l'impossible aux juridictions d'appel — Cour d'appel ne devrait pas intervenir dans les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs, à moins que la juge de première instance ait commis une erreur susceptible de révision dans son appréciation de la preuve — Interdictions ont été déclarées non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidées — Effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Droit criminel --- Charte des droits et libertés — Limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer [art. 1]

Parallèles entre les règles qui interdisent le caractère arbitraire, la portée excessive ou la disproportion totale au regard de l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et les éléments de l'analyse, fondée sur l'article premier, de la justification d'une disposition qui porte atteinte à un droit garanti par la Charte ne devraient pas permettre d'occulter les différences cruciales entre ces deux articles.

Parliament has criminalized various prostitution-related activities, including keeping a common bawdy-house (s. 210 of the Criminal Code of Canada); living off the avails of prostitution (s. 212(1)(j)); and communicating ("soliciting") for the purpose of prostitution (s. 213(1)(c)). In 1990, in Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada) ("The Prostitution Reference"), the Supreme Court of Canada held that the offences of keeping a common bawdy-house and communicating for the purpose of prostitution were constitutional.

Three sex trade workers brought an application for a declaration that the above-noted charging provisions were unconstitutional under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The application was granted and all of the impugned provisions were declared unconstitutional, subject to a judicial stay pending the disposition of any appellate proceedings. The Crown appealed.

The appeal was allowed in part. The majority of the Court of Appeal upheld the invalidity of the bawdy-house provision. It agreed that the provision against living off the avails was overbroad; its remedy was to read in the words "in circumstances of exploitation". The majority allowed the appeal with respect to the communication or "soliciting" provision.

The Attorney General appealed from the Court of Appeal's declaration that ss. 210 and 212(1)(j) of the Code were unconstitutional. The respondents cross-appealed on the issue of the constitutionality of s. 213(1)(c), and in respect of the Court of Appeal's remedy to resolve the unconstitutionality of s. 210.

Held: The appeals were dismissed; the cross-appeal was allowed.

Per McLachlin C.J.C. (LeBel, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner JJ. concurring): The Court of Appeal erred in holding that the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts were not entitled to deference. A court of appeal should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusions on social and legislative facts, absent reviewable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the evidence.

The Supreme Court of Canada's advisory opinion in The Prostitution Reference was based on the physical liberty interest under s. 7, not security of the person. Arguments based on Charter provisions that were not raised in the earlier case constituted a new legal issue.

The application judge correctly concluded that the bawdy-house prohibition materially increases the risks sex trade workers face, including preventing resort to safe houses. The bawdy-house provision negatively impacts the security of the person of sex trade workers and engages s. 7 of the Charter.

The evidence amply supported the application judge's conclusion that hiring drivers, receptionists, and bodyguards could increase the safety of sex trade workers but was prevented by the prohibition against living on the avails of prostitution of another person. Accordingly, s. 212(1)(j) of the Code negatively impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

The application judge found that face-to-face communication was an "essential tool" in reducing the risks sex trade workers face by allowing them to screen prospective clients. The prohibition on soliciting (s. 213(1)(c) of the Code) had the effect of displacing sex trade workers from familiar areas to more isolated areas, thereby making them more vulnerable. The application judge correctly concluded that the prohibition of such communication sufficed to engage security of the person under s. 7.

The applicable standard for causation should be the flexible "sufficient causal connection", which allows the circumstances of each particular case to be taken into account and represents a fair and workable threshold for engaging s. 7 of the Charter.

The basic values under s. 7 in the present case are against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality. All three principles compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. Under s. 1, the question is whether the negative impact of a law on the rights of individuals is proportionate to the pressing and substantial goal of the law in furthering the public interest.

The negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective. The harms identified by the courts below are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption that is the object of the law. A law that prevents resort to a safe haven while a suspected serial killer prowls the streets is a law that has lost sight of its purpose.

As found by the courts below, the living on the avails provision is overbroad. The law punishes everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit sex trade workers and those who could increase their safety and security.

The majority of the Court of Appeal wrongly attributed errors in reasoning to the application judge, who had had correctly concluded that prohibition on soliciting has a negative impact on the safety and lives of sex trade workers on the street that is grossly disproportionate to the possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution.

By imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution, the prohibitions at issue prevent people engaged in a risky but legal activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks.

Parliament is not precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of sex trade workers. The regulation of prostitution is a complex and delicate matter. It will be for Parliament to devise a new approach, reflecting different elements of the existing regime, should it choose to do so.

Sections 210, 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) of the Code were declared to be inconsistent with the Charter and hence void. The declaration of invalidity was suspended for one year.

Le législateur a criminalisé diverses activités liées à la prostitution, notamment l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche (art. 210 du Code criminel canadien), de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui (art. 212(1)j)) et la communication en public (la « sollicitation ») à des fins de prostitution (art. 213(1)c)). En 1990, dans le Renvoi relatif à l'art. 193 et à l'al. 195.1(1)c) du Code criminel (canadien) (le « Renvoi sur la prostitution »), la Cour suprême du Canada a estimé que les infractions relatives à l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche et à la communication en public à des fins de prostitution étaient constitutionnelles.

Trois travailleuses du sexe ont déposé une requête en vue de faire déclarer que les dispositions susmentionnées étaient inconstitutionnelles en vertu de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

La requête a été accordée et les dispositions contestées ont été déclarées inconstitutionnelles, l'effet de la décision étant suspendu le temps que les procédures d'appel connaissent leur dénouement. Le ministère public a interjeté appel.

L'appel a été accueilli en partie. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont confirmé l'invalidité de la disposition portant sur l'acte de tenir une maison de débauche. On a convenu que la disposition sur le proxénétisme avait une portée excessive et que la façon d'y remédier était de l'interpréter comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés. Les juges majoritaires ont accueilli l'appel relativement à la disposition portant sur la communication ou la « sollicitation ».

Le procureur général a formé un pourvoi à l'encontre de la déclaration de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle les art. 210 et 212(1)j) du Code étaient inconstitutionnels. Les intimées ont formé un pourvoi incident portant sur la question de la constitutionnalité de l'art. 213(1)c) et à l'égard de la mesure de réparation adoptée par la Cour d'appel pour résoudre l'inconstitutionnalité de l'art. 210.

Arrêt: Les pourvois ont été rejetés; le pourvoi incident a été accueilli.

McLachlin, J.C.C. (LeBel, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, JJ., souscrivant à son opinion) :

La Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en concluant que les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs ne commandaient pas la déférence. La Cour d'appel ne devrait pas intervenir dans les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs, à moins que la juge de première instance ait commis une erreur susceptible de révision dans son appréciation de la preuve.

L'avis consultatif de la Cour suprême du Canada dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution portait sur le droit à la liberté physique de la personne garanti par l'art. 7, et non sur la sécurité de la personne. Les prétentions d'ordre constitutionnel qui n'ont pas été invoquées dans l'affaire antérieure constituaient de nouvelles questions de droit.

La juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure que l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche augmente sensiblement le risque auquel s'exposent actuellement les travailleurs du sexe, notamment en empêchant l'existence d'endroits sûrs. La disposition sur les maisons de débauche a un effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la sécurité des travailleurs du sexe et met en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte.

La preuve étayait amplement la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle l'embauche d'un chauffeur, d'un réceptionniste ou d'un garde du corps pourrait accroître la sécurité des travailleurs du sexe, mais que l'interdiction de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui y faisait obstacle. Aussi, l'art. 212(1)j) du Code a un effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la sécurité de la personne et met en jeu l'art. 7.

La juge de première instance a conclu que la communication entre les intéressés était [TRADUCTION] « essentielle » à l'accroissement de la sécurité des travailleurs du sexe en permettant aux travailleusr du sexe de jauger leurs clients éventuels. L'interdiction de la communication (art. 213(1)c) du Code) a eu pour effet de faire migrer les travailleurs du sexe vers des lieux isolés, ce qui les a rendues plus vulnérables. La juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure que l'interdiction de la communication a une incidence sur la sécurité de la personne et met en jeu l'art. 7.

La norme de causalité applicable devrait être flexible et exiger un [TRADUCTION] « lien de causalité suffisant », ce qui permet de prendre en considération les circonstances propres à chaque affaire et constitue un critère juste et fonctionnel pour déterminer si l'art. 7 de la Charte est en jeu.

Les valeurs fondamentales qui sous-tendent l'art. 7 dans le présent dossier s'opposent à l'arbitraire, à la portée excessive et à la disproportion totale. Les trois notions supposent la comparaison de l'atteinte aux droits causée par la loi avec l'objectif de la loi, et non avec son efficacité. Pour les besoins de l'article premier, il faut se demander si l'effet préjudiciable sur les droits des personnes est proportionné à l'objectif urgent et réel de la loi dans la défense de l'intérêt public.

L'effet préjudiciable de l'interdiction de tenir des maisons de débauche sur la sécurité des demanderesses est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif. Les préjudices relevés par les juridictions inférieures sont totalement disproportionnés à l'objectif de réprimer le désordre public. La disposition qui empêche un travailleur du sexe de recourir à un refuge sûr alors qu'un tueur en série est soupçonné de sévir dans les rues est une disposition qui a perdu de vue son objectif.

Comme l'estimaient les juridictions inférieures, la portée de la disposition sur le proxénétisme est excessive. La disposition sanctionne quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans que ne soit établie de distinction entre celui qui exploite un travailleur du sexe et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'un travailleur du sexe.

Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont relevé à tort des erreurs dans le raisonnement de la juge de première instance, laquelle avait eu raison de conclure que l'interdiction de la communication a un effet préjudiciable sur la sécurité et la vie des travailleurs du sexe de la rue qui est totalement disproportionné au risque de nuisance causée par la prostitution de rue.

En imposant des conditions dangereuses à la pratique de la prostitution, les interdictions faisant l'objet du présent litige empêchent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, de prendre des mesures pour assurer leur propre protection contre les risques ainsi courus.

Il est loisible au législateur de limiter les modalités et les lieux d'exercice de la prostitution à condition qu'il le fasse sans porter atteinte aux droits constitutionnels des travailleurs du sexe. L'encadrement de la prostitution est un sujet complexe et délicat. Il appartiendra au législateur, s'il le juge opportun, de concevoir une nouvelle approche qui intègre les différents éléments du régime actuel.

Les articles 210, 212(1)j) et 213(1)c) du Code ont été déclarés non conformes à la Charte et, par conséquent, invalidés. L'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité a été suspendu pendant un an.

Words and phrases considered:

place

"Place" includes any defined space, even if unenclosed and used only temporarily (s. 197(1) of the [Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46]; R. v. Pierce and Golloher (1982), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (C.A.)). And by definition, it applies even if resorted to by only one person (s. 197(1); R. v. Worthington (1972), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (Ont. C.A.)).

in-call

. . . where the john comes to the prostitute's residence . . .

out-call

. . . where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home . . .

prostitution

. . . the exchange of sex for money . . .

arbitrariness

Arbitrariness was used to describe the situation where there is no connection between the effect and the object of the law.

Arbitrariness asks whether there is a direct connection between the purpose of the law and the impugned effect on the individual, in the sense that the effect on the individual bears some relation to the law's purpose. There must be a rational connection between the object of the measure that causes the s. 7 deprivation, and the limits it imposes on life, liberty, or security of the person ([Stewart, Hamish: Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2012], at p. 136). A law that imposes limits on these interests in a way that bears no connection to its objective arbitrarily impinges on those interests.

overbreadth

. . . "overbreadth": the law goes too far and interferes with some conduct that bears no connection to its objective.

Overbreadth deals with a law that is so broad in scope that it includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose. In this sense, the law is arbitrary in part. At its core, overbreadth addresses the situation where there is no rational connection between the purposes of the law and some, but not all, of its impacts.

failures of instrumental rationality

. . . "failures of instrumental rationality" — the situation where the law is "inadequately connected to its objective or in some sense goes too far in seeking to attain it" (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms [Hamish Stewart, Toronto: Irwin Law] (2012), at p. 151). As Peter Hogg has explained:

The doctrines of overbreadth, disproportionality and arbitrariness are all at bottom intended to address what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality", by which he means that the Court accepts the legislative objective, but scrutinizes the policy instrument enacted as the means to achieve the objective. If the policy instrument is not a rational means to achieve the objective, then the law is dysfunctional in terms of its own objective.

gross disproportionality

Gross disproportionality asks a different question from arbitrariness and overbreadth. It targets the second fundamental evil: the law's effects on life, liberty or security of the person are so grossly disproportionate to its purposes that they cannot rationally be supported.

Termes et locutions cités :

Local ou endroit

On entend par « local » ou « endroit » tout lieu défini, même s'il n'est pas enclos et n'est employé que temporairement (par. 197(1) du [Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46]; R. c. Pierce and Golloher 1982 CanLII 2153 (ON CA), (1982), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (C.A.)). De plus, il y a « local » ou « endroit » au sens de cette définition même lorsque le lieu est utilisé par une seule personne (par. 197(1); R. v. Worthington (1972), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (C.A. Ont.)).

prostitution pratiquée chez soi

. . . où la prostituée reçoit ses clients chez elle . . .

prostitution itinérante

. . . où la prostituée rejoint le client dans un lieu convenu, telle la résidence de ce dernier . . .

prostitution

. . . l'échange de services sexuels contre de l'argent . . .

arbitraire

On a qualifié d'« arbitraire » la disposition dont l'effet n'avait aucun lien avec son objet.

Déterminer qu'une disposition est arbitraire ou non exige qu'on se demande s'il existe un lien direct entre son objet et l'effet allégué sur l'intéressé, s'il y a un certain rapport entre les deux. Il doit exister un lien rationnel entre l'objet de la mesure qui cause l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7 et la limite apportée au droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne ([Stewart, Hamish: Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2012], p. 136). La disposition qui limite ce droit selon des modalités qui n'ont aucun lien avec son objet empiète arbitrairement sur ce droit.

portée excessive

. . . lorsqu'[une disposition] va trop loin et empiète sur un comportement sans lien avec son objectif.

Il y a portée excessive lorsqu'une disposition s'applique si largement qu'elle vise certains actes qui n'ont aucun lien avec son objet. La disposition est alors en partie arbitraire. Essentiellement, la situation en cause est celle où il n'existe aucun lien rationnel entre les objets de la disposition et certains de ses effets, mais pas tous.

manque de logique fonctionnelle

. . . [TRADUCTION] « manque de logique fonctionnelle », à savoir que la disposition « n'est pas suffisamment liée à son objectif ou, dans un certain sens, qu'elle va trop loin pour l'atteindre » (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ([Hamish Stewart, Toronto: Irwin Law] 2012, p. 151). Peter Hogg explique :

[TRADUCTION] Les principes liés à la portée excessive, à la disproportion et au caractère arbitraire visent tous au fond à pallier ce que Hamish Stewart appelle un « manque de logique fonctionnelle », en ce sens que le tribunal reconnaît l'objectif législatif, mais examine le moyen choisi pour l'atteindre. Si ce moyen ne permet pas logiquement d'atteindre l'objectif, la disposition est dysfonctionnelle eu égard à son propre objectif.

(« The Brilliant Career of Section 7 of the Charter » (2012), 58 S.C.L.R. (2d) 195, p. 209, renvois omis)).

disproportion totale

La disproportion totale s'attache à d'autres éléments que ceux considérés pour le caractère arbitraire et la portée excessive. Elle vise la seconde faille fondamentale, à savoir le fait que les effets de la disposition sur la vie, la liberté ou la sécurité de la personne sont si totalement disproportionnés à ses objectifs qu'ils ne peuvent avoir d'assise rationnelle.

McLachlin C.J.C. (LeBel, Fish, Abella, Rothstein, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ. concurring):

1 It is not a crime in Canada to sell sex for money. However, it is a crime to keep a bawdy-house, to live on the avails of prostitution or to communicate in public with respect to a proposed act of prostitution. It is argued that these restrictions on prostitution put the safety and lives of prostitutes at risk, and are therefore unconstitutional.

2 These appeals and the cross-appeal are not about whether prostitution should be legal or not. They are about whether the laws Parliament has enacted on how prostitution may be carried out pass constitutional muster. I conclude that they do not. I would therefore make a suspended declaration of invalidity, returning the question of how to deal with prostitution to Parliament.

I. The Case

3 Three applicants, all current or former prostitutes, brought an application seeking declarations that three provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, are unconstitutional.

4 The three impugned provisions criminalize various activities related to prostitution. They are primarily concerned with preventing public nuisance, as well as the exploitation of prostitutes. Section 210 makes it an offence to be an inmate of a bawdy-house, to be found in a bawdy-house without lawful excuse, or to be an owner, landlord, lessor, tenant, or occupier of a place who knowingly permits it to be used as a bawdy-house. Section 212(1)(j) makes it an offence to live on the avails of another's prostitution. Section 213(1)(c) makes it an offence to either stop or attempt to stop, or communicate or attempt to communicate with, someone in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or hiring a prostitute.

5 However, prostitution itself is not illegal. It is not against the law to exchange sex for money. Under the existing regime, Parliament has confined lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and "out-calls" — where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home. This reflects a policy choice on Parliament's part. Parliament is not precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of prostitutes.

6 The applicants allege that all three provisions infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by preventing prostitutes from implementing certain safety measures — such as hiring security guards or "screening" potential clients — that could protect them from violent clients. The applicants also allege that s. 213(1)(c) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that none of the provisions are saved under s. 1.

7 The backgrounds of the three applicants as revealed in their evidence were reviewed in the application judge's decision (2010 ONSC 4264, 102 O.R. (3d) 321 (Ont. S.C.J.)).

8 Terri Jean Bedford was born in Collingwood, Ontario, in 1959, and as of 2010 had 14 years of experience working as a prostitute in various Canadian cities. She worked as a street prostitute, a massage parlour attendant, an escort, an owner and manager of an escort agency, and a dominatrix. Ms. Bedford had a difficult childhood and adolescence during which she was subjected to various types of abuse. She also encountered brutal violence throughout her career — largely, she stated, while working on the street. In her experience, indoor prostitution is safer than prostitution on the street, although she conceded that safety of an indoor location can vary. Ms. Bedford has been convicted of both keeping and being an inmate of a common bawdy-house, for which she has paid a number of fines and served 15 months in jail.

9 When she ran an escort service in the 1980s, Ms. Bedford instituted various safety measures, including: ensuring someone else was on location during in-calls, except during appointments with well-known clients; ensuring that women were taken to and from out-call appointments by a boyfriend, husband, or professional driver; if an appointment was at a hotel, calling the hotel to verify the client's name and hotel room number; if an appointment was at a client's home, calling the client's phone to ensure it was the correct number; turning down appointments from clients who sounded intoxicated; and verifying that credit card numbers matched the names of clients. She claimed she was not aware of any incidents of violence by the clientele towards her employees during that time. At some point in the 1990s, Ms. Bedford ran the Bondage Bungalow, where she offered dominatrix services. She also instituted various safety measures at this establishment, and claimed she only experienced one incident of "real violence" (application decision, at para.30).

10 Ms. Bedford is not currently working in prostitution but asserted that she would like to return to working as a dominatrix in a secure, indoor location; however, she is concerned that in doing so, she would be exposed to criminal liability. Furthermore, she does not want the people assisting her to be subject to criminal liability due to the living on the avails of prostitution provision.

11 Amy Lebovitch was born in Montréal in 1979. She comes from a stable background and attended both CEGEP and university. She currently works as a prostitute and has done so since approximately 1997 in various cities in Canada. She worked first as a street prostitute, then as an escort, and later in a fetish house. Ms. Lebovitch considers herself lucky that she was never subjected to violence during her years working on the streets. She moved off the streets to work at the escort agency after seeing other women's injuries and hearing stories of the violence suffered by other street prostitutes. Ms. Lebovitch maintains that she felt safer in an indoor location; she attributed remaining safety issues mainly to poor management. Ms. Lebovitch experienced one notable instance of violence, which she did not report to the police out of fear of police scrutiny and the possibility of criminal charges.

12 Presently, Ms. Lebovitch primarily works independently out of her home, where she takes various safety precautions, including: making sure client telephone calls are from unblocked numbers; not taking calls from clients who sound drunk, high, or in another manner undesirable; asking for expectations upfront; taking clients' full names and verifying them using directory assistance; getting referrals from regular clients; and calling a third party — her "safe call" — when the client arrives and before he leaves. Ms. Lebovitch fears being charged and convicted under the bawdy-house provisions and the consequent possibility of forfeiture of her home. She says that the fear of criminal charges has caused her to work on the street on occasion. She is also concerned that her partner will be charged with living on the avails of prostitution. She has never been charged with a criminal offence of any kind. Ms. Lebovitch volunteers as the spokesperson for Sex Professionals of Canada ("SPOC"), and she also records information from women calling to report "bad dates" — incidents that ended in violence or theft. Ms. Lebovitch stated that she enjoys her job and does not plan to leave it in the foreseeable future.

13 Valerie Scott was born in Moncton, New Brunswick, in 1958. She is currently the executive director of SPOC, and she no longer works as a prostitute. In the past, she worked indoors, from her home or in hotel rooms; she also worked as a prostitute on the street, in massage parlours, and she ran a small escort business. She has never been charged with a criminal offence of any kind. When Ms. Scott worked from home, she would screen new clients by meeting them in public locations. She never experienced significant harm working from home. Around 1984, as awareness about HIV/AIDS increased, Ms. Scott was compelled to work as a street prostitute, since indoor clients felt entitled not to wear condoms. On the street, she was subjected to threats of violence, as well as verbal and physical abuse. Ms. Scott described some precautions street prostitutes took prior to the enactment of the communicating law, including working in pairs or threes and having another prostitute visibly write down the client's licence plate number, so he would know he was traceable if something was to go wrong.

14 Ms. Scott worked as an activist and, among other things, advocated against Bill C-49 (which included the current communicating provision). Ms. Scott stated that following the enactment of the communicating law, the Canadian Organization for the Rights of Prostitutes ("CORP") began receiving calls from women working in prostitution about the increased enforcement of the laws and the prevalence of bad dates. In response, Ms. Scott was involved in setting up a drop-in and phone centre for prostitutes in Toronto; within the first year, Ms. Scott spoke to approximately 250 prostitutes whose main concerns were client violence and legal matters arising from arrest. In 2000, Ms. Scott formed SPOC to revitalize and continue the work previously done by CORP. As the executive director of this organization, she testified before a Parliamentary Subcommittee on Solicitation Laws in 2005. Over the years, Ms. Scott estimates that she has spoken with approximately 1,500 women working in prostitution. If this challenge is successful, Ms. Scott would like to operate an indoor prostitution business. While she recognizes that clients may be dangerous in both outdoor and indoor locations, she would institute safety precautions such as checking identification of clients, making sure other people are close by during appointments to intervene if needed, and hiring a bodyguard.

15 The three applicants applied pursuant to rule 14.05(3)(g.1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, for an order that the provisions restricting prostitution are unconstitutional. The evidentiary record consists of over 25,000 pages of evidence in 88 volumes. The affidavit evidence was accompanied by a large volume of studies, reports, newspaper articles, legislation, Hansard and many other documents. Some of the affiants were cross-examined.

II. Legislation

16 The relevant legislation is as follows:

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

. . . . .

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Criminal Code

197. (1) In this Part,

. . . . .

"common bawdy-house" means a place that is

(a) kept or occupied, or

(b) resorted to by one or more persons for the purpose of prostitution or the practice of acts of indecency;

210. (1) Every one who keeps a common bawdy-house is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

(2) Every one who

(a) is an inmate of a common bawdy-house,

(b) is found, without lawful excuse, in a common bawdy-house, or

(c) as owner, landlord, lessor, tenant, occupier, agent or otherwise having charge or control of any place, knowingly permits the place or any part thereof to be let or used for the purposes of a common bawdy-house, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(3) Where a person is convicted of an offence under subsection (1), the court shall cause a notice of the conviction to be served on the owner, landlord or lessor of the place in respect of which the person is convicted or his agent, and the notice shall contain a statement to the effect that it is being served pursuant to this section.

(4) Where a person on whom a notice is served under subsection (3) fails forthwith to exercise any right he may have to determine the tenancy or right of occupation of the person so convicted, and thereafter any person is convicted of an offence under subsection (1) in respect of the same premises, the person on whom the notice was served shall be deemed to have committed an offence under subsection (1) unless he proves that he has taken all reasonable steps to prevent the recurrence of the offence.

212. (1) Every one who

. . . . .

(j) lives wholly or in part on the avails of prostitution of another person, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years.

213. (1) Every person who in a public place or in any place open to public view

. . . . .

(c) stops or attempts to stop any person or in any manner communicates or attempts to communicate with any person for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

III. Prior Decisions

Ontario Superior Court of Justice (Himel J.)

17 The application judge, Himel J., concluded that the applicants had private interest standing to challenge the provisions. She held that the decision of this Court upholding the bawdy-house and communicating law in the Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123 (S.C.C.) ("Prostitution Reference"), did not prevent her from reviewing their constitutionality because: (1) s. 7 jurisprudence has evolved considerably since 1990; in particular, the doctrines of arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality had not yet been fully articulated and therefore were not argued or considered in the Prostitution Reference; (2) the evidentiary record before her was much richer, based on research not available in 1990; (3) the social, political and economic assumptions underlying the Prostitution Reference may no longer be valid; and (4) the type of expression at issue differed from that considered in the Prostitution Reference.

18 In considering the legislative scheme as it exists and the evidence before her, Himel J. found that each of the impugned laws deprived the applicants and others like them of their liberty (by reason of potential imprisonment) and their security of the person (because they increased the risk of injury). The increased risk of violence created by the laws constituted a "sufficient" cause, engaging the security of the person protected by s. 7. She stated:

> With respect to s. 210, the evidence suggests that working in-call is the safest way to sell sex; yet, prostitutes who attempt to increase their level of safety by working in-call face criminal sanction. With respect to s. 212(1)(j), prostitution, including legal out-call work, may be made less dangerous if a prostitute is allowed to hire an assistant or a bodyguard; yet, such business relationships are illegal due to the living on the avails of prostitution provision. Finally, s. 213(1)(c) prohibits street prostitutes, who are largely the most vulnerable prostitutes and face an alarming amount of violence, from screening clients at an early, and crucial, stage of a potential transaction, thereby putting them at an increased risk of violence.
> In conclusion, these three provisions prevent prostitutes from taking precautions, some extremely rudimentary, that can decrease the risk of violence towards them. Prostitutes are faced with deciding between their liberty and their security of the person. Thus, while it is ultimately the client who inflicts violence upon a prostitute, in my view the law plays a sufficient contributory role in preventing a prostitute from taking steps that could reduce the risk of such violence. [paras. 361-62]

19 Himel J. concluded that the deprivation of security thus established was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, notably the requirements that laws not infringe security of the person in a way that is arbitrary, overbroad or grossly disproportionate.

20 Himel J. found the bawdy-house provision (s. 210) overbroad because it extended to virtually any place and allowed for convictions that were unrelated to the objective of preventing community nuisance. And the harms it inflicted were grossly disproportionate to the few nuisance complaints received. The effect of preventing prostitutes from working in-call at a regular indoor location was to force them to choose between their liberty interest (obeying the law) and their personal security.

21 Himel J. found the prohibition against living on the avails of prostitution (s. 212(1)(j)) arbitrary, overbroad and grossly disproportionate. While targeting exploitation by pimps, the provision encompasses virtually anyone who provides services to prostitutes. Prostitutes are forced to work alone, increasing the risk of harm, or work with people prepared to break the law. It increases reliance on pimps, and is therefore arbitrary. It catches non-exploitative relationships, and is therefore overbroad. And it creates the risk of severe violence from pimps and exploiters, making it grossly disproportionate.

22 Finally, Himel J. found the prohibition on communicating for the purposes of prostitution (s. 213(1)(c)) violates the principle against gross disproportionality. By preventing prostitutes from screening clients — an essential tool for enhancing their safety — it endangers them out of all proportion to the small social benefit it provides. It also infringes the freedom of expression guarantee under s. 2(b) of the Charter.

23 Himel J. found that the infringement of the s. 7 and s. 2(b) rights imposed by the laws could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

24 In the result, Himel J. declared the communicating and living on the avails offences unconstitutional, without suspension, and rectified the bawdy-house prohibition by striking the word "prostitution" from the definition of "common bawdy-house" in s. 197(1) as it applies to s. 210.

Ontario Court of Appeal (Doherty, Rosenberg, Feldman, MacPherson and Cronk JJ.A.)

25 The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Doherty, Rosenberg and Feldman J.J.A. (with whom the minority per MacPherson J.A. concurred on these issues), agreed with the application judge that the bawdy-house and living on the avails provisions were unconstitutional on the basis that they engaged the security of the person in a way that was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice (Bedford v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 ONCA 186, 109 O.R. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.)). In particular, the majority found as follows.

26 The prohibition on bawdy-houses was overbroad and had an impact on security that was grossly disproportionate to any benefit conferred. The court agreed that the word "prostitution" should be struck from the definition of "common bawdy-house". However, it suspended the declaration of invalidity for 12 months.

27 The prohibition on living on the avails was not arbitrary, as the application judge found, but was overbroad and grossly disproportionate in its effects. However, instead of striking the provision out, the court narrowed the provision by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" (para. 267).

28 The majority of the Court of Appeal found the prohibition on communicating in public for the purpose of prostitution was constitutional. While it engaged security of the person, it did so in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The provision aims to combat nuisance-related problems caused by street solicitation. It is not arbitrary; it has been effective in protecting residential neighbourhoods from the targeted harms. Nor is it overbroad or grossly disproportionate. In finding the provision grossly disproportionate, the application judge erred by understating the objective in a way that did not reflect the evidence, and by over-emphasizing the impact of the provision on prostitutes' security of the person. The evidence did not establish that inability to communicate with customers contributed to the harm experienced by prostitutes to a degree that made the impact grossly disproportionate to the benefits. The majority also found that it was bound by the Prostitution Reference: thus, this provision violated s. 2(b) of the Charter, but was justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

29 The minority, per MacPherson J.A. (dissenting only on this one issue), would have struck down the communicating prohibition under ss. 7 and 1 of the Charter as grossly disproportionate to the legislative objective of combatting social nuisance. The minority found that: (1) its effects were equally or more serious than the other provision; (2) the application judge correctly stated the objective of the provision; (3) the record supported the conclusion that screening is an essential tool for safety; (4) beyond screening, the provision adversely impacts safety by forcing prostitutes to work in isolated and dangerous areas; (5) the provision impacts the most vulnerable class of prostitutes, street workers, raising s. 15 equality concerns; (6) the recent decision of this Court in PHS Community Services Society v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 134 (S.C.C.), supports the conclusion that the provision violates s. 7; and (7) the compounding effect of legislation that drives prostitutes onto the streets and then denies them the ability to evaluate prospective clients supports unconstitutionality. This conclusion made it unnecessary for the minority to consider s. 2(b) of the Charter.

30 In the course of arriving at its conclusions, the majority of the Court of Appeal made a number of ancillary observations of importance.

31 In considering the doctrine of stare decisis and whether the application judge was bound by the Prostitution Reference, the court adopted a narrow view of when a trial judge can reconsider previous decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on the basis of changes in the social, economic or political landscapes: the trial judge cannot change the law, but is limited to making findings of fact and credibility to create the necessary evidentiary record which the Supreme Court of Canada can then consider. Reasons that justify a court departing from its own prior decisions cannot justify a lower court revisiting binding authority. This applies to determining what constitutes a reasonable limit on a right under s. 1 of the Charter (paras. 75-76).

32 On the standard of causation required to engage s. 7, the Court of Appeal held that the traditional causation analysis is inappropriate where it is legislation, and not the actions of a government official, that is said to have interfered with a s. 7 interest. Rather, the judge should conduct a practical, pragmatic analysis to determine what the legislation prohibits or requires, its impact on the persons affected, and whether this amounts to an interference with protected rights (paras. 107-9).

33 On the issue of deference to findings of fact of the application judge, the Court of Appeal held that findings on social and legislative facts are not entitled to appellate deference, while findings on the credibility of affiants and the objectivity of expert witnesses attract deference (paras. 128-31).

34 Regarding the purpose of the laws, the court rejected the Attorney General of Ontario's submission that there was an overarching legislative objective to eradicate, or at least discourage, prostitution. Rather, the purpose of each of the laws must be independently ascertained with reference to its unique historical context (paras. 165-70).

35 On the principles of fundamental justice, the Court of Appeal held that arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality each use a different filter to examine the connection between the law and the legislative objective. Arbitrariness is the absence of any link between the objective of the law and its negative impact on security of the person. Overbreadth addresses the situation where the law imposes limits on security of the person that go beyond what is required to achieve its objective. Gross disproportionality describes the case where the effects of the impugned law are so extreme that they cannot be justified by its object (paras. 143-49).

IV. Discussion

36 The appellant Attorneys General appeal from the Court of Appeal's declaration that ss. 210 and 212(1)(j) of the Code are unconstitutional. The respondents cross-appeal on the issue of the constitutionality of s. 213(1)(c), and in respect of the Court of Appeal's remedy to resolve the unconstitutionality of s. 210.

37 Before turning to the Charter arguments before us, I will first discuss two preliminary issues: (1) whether the 1990 decision in the Prostitution Reference, upholding the bawdy-house and communication prohibitions, is binding on trial judges and this Court; and (2) the degree of deference to be accorded to the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts.

Preliminary Issues

Revisiting the Prostitution Reference

38 Certainty in the law requires that courts follow and apply authoritative precedents. Indeed, this is the foundational principle upon which the common law relies.

39 The issue of when, if ever, such precedents may be departed from takes two forms. The first "vertical" question is when, if ever, a lower court may depart from a precedent established by a higher court. The second "horizontal" question is when a court such as the Supreme Court of Canada may depart from its own precedents.

40 In this case, the precedent in question is the Supreme Court of Canada's 1990 advisory opinion in the Prostitution Reference, which upheld the constitutionality of the prohibitions on bawdy-houses and communicating — two of the three provisions challenged in this case. The questions in that case were whether the laws infringed s. 7 or s. 2(b) of the Charter, and, if so, whether the limit was justified under s. 1. The Court concluded that neither of the impugned laws were inconsistent with s. 7, and that although the communicating law infringed s. 2(b), it was a justifiable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. While reference opinions may not be legally binding, in practice they have been followed (G. Rubin, "The Nature, Use and Effect of Reference Cases in Canadian Constitutional Law" (1960), 6 McGill L.J. 168, at p. 175).

41 The application judge in this case held that she could revisit those conclusions because: the legal issues under s. 7 were different, in light of the evolution of the law in that area; the evidentiary record was richer and provided research not available in 1990; the social, political and economic assumptions underlying the Prostitution Reference no longer applied; and the type of expression at issue in that case (commercial expression) differed from the expression at issue in this case (expression promoting safety). The Court of Appeal disagreed with respect to the s. 2(b) issue, holding that a trial judge asked to depart from a precedent on the basis of new evidence, or new social, political or economic assumptions, may make findings of fact for consideration by the higher courts, but cannot apply them to arrive at a different conclusion from the previous precedent (at para. 76).

42 In my view, a trial judge can consider and decide arguments based on Charter provisions that were not raised in the earlier case; this constitutes a new legal issue. Similarly, the matter may be revisited if new legal issues are raised as a consequence of significant developments in the law, or if there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate.

43 The intervener, the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, argues that the common law principle of stare decisis is subordinate to the Constitution and cannot require a court to uphold a law which is unconstitutional. It submits that lower courts should not be limited to acting as "mere scribe[s]", creating a record and findings without conducting a legal analysis (I.F., at para. 25).

44 I agree. As the David Asper Centre also noted, however, a lower court is not entitled to ignore binding precedent, and the threshold for revisiting a matter is not an easy one to reach. In my view, as discussed above, this threshold is met when a new legal issue is raised, or if there is a significant change in the circumstances or evidence. This balances the need for finality and stability with the recognition that when an appropriate case arises for revisiting precedent, a lower court must be able to perform its full role.

45 It follows that the application judge in this case was entitled to rule on whether the laws in question violated the security of the person interests under s. 7 of the Charter. In the Prostitution Reference, the majority decision was based on the s. 7 physical liberty interest alone. Only Lamer J., writing for himself, touched on security of the person — and then, only in the context of economic interests. Contrary to the submission of the Attorney General of Canada, whether the s. 7 interest at issue is economic liberty or security of the person is not "a distinction without a difference" (A.F., at para. 94). The rights protected by s. 7 are "independent interests, each of which must be given independent significance by the Court" (R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (S.C.C.), at p. 52). Furthermore, the principles of fundamental justice considered in the Prostitution Reference dealt with vagueness and the permissibility of indirect criminalization. The principles raised in this case — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — have, to a large extent, developed only in the last 20 years.

46 These considerations do not apply to the question of whether the communication provision is a justified limit on freedom of expression. That issue was decided in the Prostitution Reference. Re-characterizing the type of expression alleged to be infringed did not convert this argument into a new legal issue, nor did the more current evidentiary record or the shift in attitudes and perspectives amount to a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifted the parameters of the debate.

47 This brings me to the question of whether this Court should depart from its previous decision on the s. 2(b) aspect of this case. At heart, this is a balancing exercise, in which the Court must weigh correctness against certainty (Craig v. R., 2012 SCC 43, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 489 (S.C.C.), at para. 27). In this case, however, it is not necessary to determine whether this Court can depart from its s. 2(b) conclusion in the Prostitution Reference, since it is possible to resolve the case entirely on s. 7 grounds.

Deference to the Application Judge's Findings on Social and Legislative Facts

48 The Court of Appeal held that the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts — that is, facts about society at large, established by complex social science evidence — were not entitled to deference. With respect, I cannot agree. As this Court stated in Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235 (S.C.C.), appellate courts should not interfere with a trial judge's findings of fact, absent a palpable and overriding error.

49 When social and legislative evidence is put before a judge of first instance, the judge's duty is to evaluate and weigh that evidence in order to arrive at the conclusions of fact necessary to decide the case. The trial judge is charged with the responsibility of establishing the record on which subsequent appeals are founded. Absent reviewable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the evidence, a court of appeal should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusions on social and legislative facts. This division of labour is basic to our court system. The first instance judge determines the facts; appeal courts review the decision for correctness in law or palpable and overriding error in fact. This applies to social and legislative facts as much as to findings of fact as to what happened in a particular case.

50 There are two important practical reasons not to depart from the usual standard of review simply because social or legislative facts are at issue.

51 First, to do so would require the appeal court to duplicate the sometimes time-consuming and tedious work of the first instance judge in reviewing all the material and reconciling differences between the experts, studies and research results. A new set of judges would need to take the hours if not weeks required to intimately appreciate and analyze the evidence. And counsel for the parties would be required to take the appellate judges through all the evidence once again so they could draw their own conclusions. All this would increase the costs and delay in the litigation process. In a review for error — which is what an appeal is — it makes more sense to have counsel point out alleged errors in the trial judge's conclusions on the evidence and confine the court of appeal to determining whether those errors vitiate the trial judge's conclusions.

52 Second, social and legislative facts may be intertwined with adjudicative facts — that is, the facts of the case at hand — and with issues of credibility of experts. To posit a different standard of review for adjudicative facts and the credibility of affiants and expert witnesses on the one hand, and social and legislative facts on the other (as proposed by the Court of Appeal), is to ask the impossible of courts of appeal. Untangling the different sources of those conclusions and applying different standards of review to them would immensely complicate the appellate task.

53 As the Attorney General of Canada points out, this Court's decision in RJR-Macdonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199 (S.C.C.), suggested that legislative fact findings are owed less deference. However, the use of social science evidence in Charter litigation has evolved significantly since RJR-MacDonald was decided. In the intervening years, this Court has expressed a preference for social science evidence to be presented through an expert witness (R. v. Malmo-Levine, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 571 (S.C.C.), at paras. 26-28; R. v. Spence, 2005 SCC 71, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 458 (S.C.C.), at para. 68). The assessment of expert evidence relies heavily on the trial judge (R. v. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624, 97 O.R. (3d) 330 (Ont. C.A.), at paras. 62-96). This is particularly so in the wake of the Ontario report by Justice Goudge, which emphasized the role of the trial judge in preventing miscarriages of justice flowing from flawed expert evidence (Inquiry into Pediatric Forensic Pathology in Ontario: Report, vol. 3, Policy and Recommendations (2008)). The distinction between adjudicative and legislative facts can no longer justify gradations of deference.

54 This case illustrates the problem. The application judge arrived at her conclusions on the impact of the impugned laws on s. 7 security interests on the basis of the personal evidence of the applicants, the evidence of affiants and experts, and documentary evidence in the form of studies, reports of expert panels and Parliamentary records. The Court of Appeal conceded that it must accord deference to her findings of adjudicative facts and the credibility of affiants and experts, but said it owes no deference to findings on social and legislative facts. The task of applying different standards of review when the evidence is intertwined would be daunting.

55 It is suggested that no deference is required on social and legislative facts because appellate courts are in as good a position to evaluate such evidence as trial judges. If this were so, adjudicative facts presented only in affidavit form would similarly be owed less deference. Yet this Court has been clear that, absent express statutory instruction, there is no middling standard of review for findings of fact (L. (H.) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401 (S.C.C.)). Furthermore, this view does not meet the concerns of duplication of effort and the intertwining of such evidence with other kinds of evidence. Nor does it address the point that the appellate task is not to review evidence globally, but rather to review the conclusions the first instance judge has drawn from the evidence.

56 For these reasons, I am of the view that a no-deference standard of appellate review for social and legislative facts should be rejected. The standard of review for findings of fact — whether adjudicative, social, or legislative — remains palpable and overriding error.

Section 7 Analysis

57 In the discussion that follows, I first consider whether the applicants have established that the impugned laws impose limits on security of the person, thus engaging s. 7. I then examine the appellant Attorneys Generals' arguments that the laws do not cause the alleged harms. I go on to consider whether any limits on security of the person are in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Is Security of the Person Engaged?

58 Section 7 provides that the state cannot deny a person's right to life, liberty or security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. At this stage, the question is whether the impugned laws negatively impact or limit the applicants' security of the person, thus bringing them within the ambit of, or engaging, s. 7 of the Charter.[1]

59 Here, the applicants argue that the prohibitions on bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution, and communicating in public for the purposes of prostitution, heighten the risks they face in prostitution — itself a legal activity. The application judge found that the evidence supported this proposition and the Court of Appeal agreed.

60 For reasons set out below, I am of the same view. The prohibitions at issue do not merely impose conditions on how prostitutes operate. They go a critical step further, by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution; they prevent people engaged in a risky — but legal — activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks.

Sections 197 and 210: Keeping a Common Bawdy-House

61 It is not an offence to sell sex for money. The bawdy-house provisions, however, make it an offence to do so in any "place" that is "kept or occupied" or "resorted to" for the purpose of prostitution (ss. 197 and 210(1) of the Code). The reach of these provisions is broad. "Place" includes any defined space, even if unenclosed and used only temporarily (s. 197(1) of the Code; R. v. Pierce (1982), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (Ont. C.A.)). And by definition, it applies even if resorted to by only one person (s. 197(1); R. v. Worthington (1972), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (Ont. C.A.)).

62 The practical effect of s. 210 is to confine lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and out-calls (application decision, at para. 385). In-calls, where the john comes to the prostitute's residence, are prohibited. Out-calls, where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home, are allowed. Working on the street is also permitted, though the practice of street prostitution is significantly limited by the prohibition on communicating in public (s. 213 (1) (c)).

63 The application judge found, on a balance of probabilities, that the safest form of prostitution is working independently from a fixed location (para. 300). She concluded that indoor work is far less dangerous than street prostitution — a finding that the evidence amply supports. She also concluded that out-call work is not as safe as in-call work, particularly under the current regime where prostitutes are precluded by virtue of the living on the avails provision from hiring a driver or security guard. Since the bawdy-house provision makes the safety-enhancing method of in-call prostitution illegal, the application judge concluded that the bawdy-house prohibition materially increased the risk prostitutes face under the present regime. I agree.

64 First, the prohibition prevents prostitutes from working in a fixed indoor location, which would be safer than working on the streets or meeting clients at different locations, especially given the current prohibition on hiring drivers or security guards. This, in turn, prevents prostitutes from having a regular clientele and from setting up indoor safeguards like receptionists, assistants, bodyguards and audio room monitoring, which would reduce risks (application decision, at para. 421). Second, it interferes with provision of health checks and preventive health measures. Finally — a point developed in argument before us — the bawdy-house prohibition prevents resort to safe houses, to which prostitutes working on the street can take clients. In Vancouver, for example, "Grandma's House" was established to support street workers in the Downtown Eastside, at about the same time as fears were growing that a serial killer was prowling the streets — fears which materialized in the notorious Robert Pickton. Street prostitutes — who the application judge found are largely the most vulnerable class of prostitutes, and who face an alarming amount of violence (para. 361) — were able to bring clients to Grandma's House. However, charges were laid under s. 210, and although the charges were eventually stayed — four years after they were laid — Grandma's House was shut down (supplementary affidavit of Dr. John Lowman, May 6, 2009, J.A.R., vol. 20, at p. 5744). For some prostitutes, particularly those who are destitute, safe houses such as Grandma's House may be critical. For these people, the ability to work in brothels or hire security, even if those activities were lawful, may be illusory.

65 I conclude, therefore, that the bawdy-house provision negatively impacts the security of the person of prostitutes and engages s. 7 of the Charter.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

66 Section 212(1)(j) criminalizes living on the avails of prostitution of another person, wholly or in part. While targeting parasitic relationships (R. v. Downey, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 10 (S.C.C.)), it has a broad reach. As interpreted by the courts, it makes it a crime for anyone to supply a service to a prostitute, because she is a prostitute (R. v. Grilo (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 514 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Barrow (2001), 54 O.R. (3d) 417 (Ont. C.A.)). In effect, it prevents a prostitute from hiring bodyguards, drivers and receptionists. The application judge found that by denying prostitutes access to these security-enhancing safeguards, the law prevented them from taking steps to reduce the risks they face and negatively impacted their security of the person (para. 361). As such, she found that the law engages s. 7 of the Charter.

67 The evidence amply supports the judge's conclusion. Hiring drivers, receptionists, and bodyguards, could increase prostitutes' safety (application decision, at para. 421), but the law prevents them from doing so. Accordingly, I conclude that s. 212(1)(j) negatively impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in a Public Place

68 Section 213(1)(c) prohibits communicating or attempting to communicate for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute, in a public place or a place open to public view. The provision extends to conduct short of verbal communication by prohibiting stopping or attempting to stop any person for those purposes (R. v. Head (1987), 59 C.R. (3d) 80 (B.C. C.A.)).

69 The application judge found that face-to-face communication is an "essential tool" in enhancing street prostitutes' safety (para. 432). Such communication, which the law prohibits, allows prostitutes to screen prospective clients for intoxication or propensity to violence, which can reduce the risks they face (paras. 301 and 421). This conclusion, based on the evidence before her, sufficed to engage security of the person under s. 7.

70 The application judge also found that the communicating law has had the effect of displacing prostitutes from familiar areas, where they may be supported by friends and regular customers, to more isolated areas, thereby making them more vulnerable (paras. 331 and 502).

71 On the evidence accepted by the application judge, the law prohibits communication that would allow street prostitutes to increase their safety. By prohibiting communicating in public for the purpose of prostitution, the law prevents prostitutes from screening clients and setting terms for the use of condoms or safe houses. In these ways, it significantly increases the risks they face.

72 I conclude that the evidence supports the application judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

A Closer Look at Causation

73 For the reasons discussed above, the application judge concluded — and I agree — that the impugned laws negatively impact and thus engage security of the person rights of prostitutes. However, the appellant Attorneys General contend that s. 7 is not engaged because there is an insufficient causal connection between the laws and the risks faced by prostitutes. First, they argue that the courts below erroneously measured causation by an attenuated standard. Second, they argue that it is the choice of the applicants to engage in prostitution, rather than the law, that is the causal source of the harms they face. These arguments cannot succeed.

(a) The Nature of the Required Causal Connection

74 Three possible standards for causation are raised for our consideration: (1) "sufficient causal connection", adopted by the application judge (paras. 287-88); (2) a general "impact" approach, adopted by the Court of Appeal (paras. 108-9); and (3) "active, foreseeable and direct" causal connection, urged by the appellant Attorneys General (A.G. of Canada factum, at para. 65; A.G. of Ontario factum, at paras. 14-15).

75 I conclude that the "sufficient causal connection" standard should prevail. This is a flexible standard, which allows the circumstances of each particular case to be taken into account. Adopted in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307 (S.C.C.), and applied in a number of subsequent cases (see e.g. United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283 (S.C.C.); Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3 (S.C.C.)), it posits the need for "a sufficient causal connection between the state-caused [effect] and the prejudice suffered by the [claimant]" for s. 7 to be engaged (Blencoe, at para. 60 (emphasis added)).

76 A sufficient causal connection standard does not require that the impugned government action or law be the only or the dominant cause of the prejudice suffered by the claimant, and is satisfied by a reasonable inference, drawn on a balance of probabilities (Khadr v. Canada (Prime Minister), 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44 (S.C.C.), at para. 21). A sufficient causal connection is sensitive to the context of the particular case and insists on a real, as opposed to a speculative, link. Understood in this way, a sufficient causal connection standard is consistent with the substance of the standard that the Court of Appeal applied in this case. While I do not agree with the Court of Appeal that causation is not the appropriate lens for examining whether legislation — as opposed to the conduct of state actors — engages s. 7 security interests, its "practical and pragmatic" inquiry (para. 108) tracks the process followed in cases such as Blencoe and Khadr.

77 The Attorney General of Canada argues for a higher standard. The prejudice to the claimant's security interest, he argues, must be active, foreseeable, and a "necessary link" (factum, at paras. 62 and 65). He relies on this Court's statement in Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (S.C.C.), (cited by way of contrast in Blencoe, at para. 69) that "[i]n the absence of government involvement, Mrs. Rodriguez would not have suffered a deprivation of her s. 7 rights." He also relies on the Court's statement in Suresh, at para. 54, that "[a]t least where Canada's participation is a necessary precondition for the deprivation and where the deprivation is an entirely foreseeable consequence of Canada's participation, the government does not avoid the guarantee of fundamental justice". These statements establish that a causal connection is made out when the state action is a foreseeable and necessary cause of the prejudice. They do not, however, establish that this is the only way a causal connection engaging s. 7 of the Charter can be demonstrated.

78 Finally, from a practical perspective, a sufficient causal connection represents a fair and workable threshold for engaging s. 7 of the Charter. This is the port of entry for s. 7 claims. The claimant bears the burden of establishing this connection. Even if established, it does not end the inquiry, since the claimant must go on to show that the deprivation of her security of the person is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Although mere speculation will not suffice to establish causation, to set the bar too high risks barring meritorious claims. What is required is a sufficient connection, having regard to the context of the case.

(b) Is the Causal Connection Negated by Choice or the Role of Third Parties?

79 The Attorneys General of Canada and Ontario argue that prostitutes choose to engage in an inherently risky activity. They can avoid both the risk inherent in prostitution and any increased risk that the laws impose simply by choosing not to engage in this activity. They say that choice — and not the law — is the real cause of their injury.

80 The Attorneys General contend that Parliament is entitled to regulate prostitution as it sees fit. Anyone who chooses to sell sex for money must accept these conditions. If the conditions imposed by the law prejudice their security, it is their choice to engage in the activity, not the law, that is the cause.

81 What the applicants seek, the Attorneys General assert, is a constitutional right to engage in risky commercial activities. Thus the Attorney General of Ontario describes the s. 7 claim in this case as a "veiled assertion of a positive right to vocational safety" (factum, at para. 25).

82 The Attorneys General rely on this Court's decision in Malmo-Levine, which upheld the constitutionality of the prohibition of possession of marijuana on the basis that the recreational use of marijuana was a "lifestyle choice" and that lifestyle choices were not constitutionally protected (para. 185).

83 The Attorneys General buttress this argument by asserting that if this Court accepts that these laws can be viewed as causing prejudice to the applicants' security, then many other laws that leave open the choice to engage in risky activities by only partially or indirectly regulating those activities will be rendered unconstitutional.

84 Finally, in a variant on the argument that the impugned laws are not the cause of the applicants' alleged loss of security, the Attorneys General argue that the source of the harm is third parties — the johns who use and abuse prostitutes and the pimps who exploit them.

85 For the following reasons, I cannot accept the argument that it is not the law, but rather prostitutes' choice and third parties, that cause the risks complained of in this case.

86 First, while some prostitutes may fit the description of persons who freely choose (or at one time chose) to engage in the risky economic activity of prostitution, many prostitutes have no meaningful choice but to do so. Ms. Bedford herself stated that she initially prostituted herself "to make enough money to at least feed myself" (cross-examination of Ms. Bedford, J.A.R., vol. 2, at p. 92). As the application judge found, street prostitutes, with some exceptions, are a particularly marginalized population (paras. 458 and 472). Whether because of financial desperation, drug addictions, mental illness, or compulsion from pimps, they often have little choice but to sell their bodies for money. Realistically, while they may retain some minimal power of choice — what the Attorney General of Canada called "constrained choice" (transcript, at p. 22) — these are not people who can be said to be truly "choosing" a risky line of business (see PHS, at paras. 97-101).

87 Second, even accepting that there are those who freely choose to engage in prostitution, it must be remembered that prostitution — the exchange of sex for money — is not illegal. The causal question is whether the impugned laws make this lawful activity more dangerous. An analogy could be drawn to a law preventing a cyclist from wearing a helmet. That the cyclist chooses to ride her bike does not diminish the causal role of the law in making that activity riskier. The challenged laws relating to prostitution are no different.

88 Nor is it accurate to say that the claim in this case is a veiled assertion of a positive right to vocational safety. The applicants are not asking the government to put into place measures making prostitution safe. Rather, they are asking this Court to strike down legislative provisions that aggravate the risk of disease, violence and death.

89 It makes no difference that the conduct of pimps and johns is the immediate source of the harms suffered by prostitutes. The impugned laws deprive people engaged in a risky, but legal, activity of the means to protect themselves against those risks. The violence of a john does not diminish the role of the state in making a prostitute more vulnerable to that violence.

90 The government's call for deference in addressing the problems associated with prostitution has no role at this stage of the analysis. Calls for deference cannot insulate legislation that creates serious harmful effects from the charge that they negatively impact security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. The question of deference arises under the principles of fundamental justice, not at the early stage of considering whether a person's life, liberty, or security of the person is infringed.

91 Finally, recognizing that laws with serious harmful effects may engage security of the person does not mean that a host of other criminal laws will be invalidated. Trivial impingements on security of the person do not engage s. 7 (New Brunswick (Minister of Health & Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46 (S.C.C.), at para. 59). As already discussed, the applicant must show that the impugned law is sufficiently connected to the prejudice suffered before s. 7 is engaged. And even if s. 7 is found to be engaged, the applicant must then show that the deprivation of security is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

92 For all these reasons, I reject the arguments of the Attorneys General that the cause of the harm is not the impugned laws, but rather the actions of third parties and the prostitutes' choice to engage in prostitution. As I concluded above, the laws engage s. 7 of the Charter. That conclusion remains undisturbed.

Principles of Fundamental Justice

The Applicable Norms

93 I have concluded that the impugned laws deprive prostitutes of security of the person, engaging s. 7. The remaining step in the s. 7 analysis is to determine whether this deprivation is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If so, s. 7 is not breached.

94 The principles of fundamental justice set out the minimum requirements that a law that negatively impacts on a person's life, liberty, or security of the person must meet. As Lamer J. put it, "[t]he term 'principles of fundamental justice' is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right" (Reference re s. 94(2) of Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (S.C.C.) ("Motor Vehicle Reference"), at p. 512).

95 The principles of fundamental justice have significantly evolved since the birth of the Charter. Initially, the principles of fundamental justice were thought to refer narrowly to principles of natural justice that define procedural fairness. In the Motor Vehicle Reference, this Court held otherwise:

> ... it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" as being synonymous with natural justice .... To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this Court toward the interpretation of Charter rights in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, per Estey J., and Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra. [pp. 501-2]

96 The Motor Vehicle Reference recognized that the principles of fundamental justice are about the basic values underpinning our constitutional order. The s. 7 analysis is concerned with capturing inherently bad laws: that is, laws that take away life, liberty, or security of the person in a way that runs afoul of our basic values. The principles of fundamental justice are an attempt to capture those values. Over the years, the jurisprudence has given shape to the content of these basic values. In this case, we are concerned with the basic values against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality.

97 The concepts of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality evolved organically as courts were faced with novel Charter claims.

98 Arbitrariness was used to describe the situation where there is no connection between the effect and the object of the law. In Morgentaler, the accused challenged provisions of the Criminal Code that required abortions to be approved by a therapeutic abortion committee of an accredited or approved hospital. The purpose of the law was to protect women's health. The majority found that the requirement that all therapeutic abortions take place in accredited hospitals did not contribute to the objective of protecting women's health and, in fact, caused delays that were detrimental to women's health. Thus, the law violated basic values because the effect of the law actually contravened the objective of the law. Beetz J. called this "manifest unfairness" (Morgentaler, at p. 120), but later cases interpreted this as an "arbitrariness" analysis (see Chaoulli c. Québec (Procureur général), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791 (S.C.C.), at para. 133, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.).

99 In Chaoulli, the applicant challenged a Quebec law that prohibited private health insurance for services that were available in the public sector. The purpose of the provision was to protect the public health care system and prevent the diversion of resources from the public system. The majority found, on the basis of international evidence, that private health insurance and a public health system could co-exist. Three of the four-judge majority found that the prohibition was "arbitrary" because there was no real connection on the facts between the effect and the objective of the law.

100 Most recently, in PHS, this Court found that the Minister's decision not to extend a safe injection site's exemption from drug possession laws was arbitrary. The purpose of drug possession laws was the protection of health and public safety, and the services provided by the safe injection site actually contributed to these objectives. Thus, the effect of not extending the exemption — that is, prohibiting the safe injection site from operating — was contrary to the objectives of the drug possession laws.

101 Another way in which laws may violate our basic values is through what the cases have called "overbreadth": the law goes too far and interferes with some conduct that bears no connection to its objective. In R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761 (S.C.C.), the accused challenged a vagrancy law that prohibited offenders convicted of listed offences from "loitering" in public parks. The majority of the Court found that the law, which aimed to protect children from sexual predators, was overbroad; insofar as the law applied to offenders who did not constitute a danger to children, and insofar as it applied to parks where children were unlikely to be present, it was unrelated to its objective.

102 In R. c. Demers, 2004 SCC 46, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 489 (S.C.C.), the challenged provisions of the Criminal Code prevented an accused who was found unfit to stand trial from receiving an absolute discharge, and subjected the accused to indefinite appearances before a review board. The purpose of the provisions was "to allow for the ongoing treatment or assessment of the accused in order for him or her to become fit for an eventual trial" (at para. 41). The Court found that insofar as the law applied to permanently unfit accused, who would never become fit to stand trial, the objective did "not apply" and therefore the law was overbroad (at paras. 42-43).

103 Laws are also in violation of our basic values when the effect of the law is grossly disproportionate to the state's objective. In Malmo-Levine, the accused challenged the prohibition on the possession of marijuana on the basis that its effects were grossly disproportionate to its objective. Although the Court agreed that a law with grossly disproportionate effects would violate our basic norms, the Court found that this was not such a case: "... the effects on accused persons of the present law, including the potential of imprisonment, fall within the broad latitude within which the Constitution permits legislative action" (para. 175).

104 In PHS, this Court found that the Minister's refusal to exempt the safe injection site from drug possession laws was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice because the effect of denying health services and increasing the risk of death and disease of injection drug users was grossly disproportionate to the objectives of the drug possession laws, namely public health and safety.

105 The overarching lesson that emerges from the case law is that laws run afoul of our basic values when the means by which the state seeks to attain its objective is fundamentally flawed, in the sense of being arbitrary, overbroad, or having effects that are grossly disproportionate to the legislative goal. To deprive citizens of life, liberty, or security of the person by laws that violate these norms is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

106 As these principles have developed in the jurisprudence, they have not always been applied consistently. The Court of Appeal below pointed to the confusion that has been caused by the "commingling" of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality (at paras. 143-51). This Court itself recently noted the conflation of the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality (R. v. Khawaja, 2012 SCC 69, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 555 (S.C.C.), at paras. 38-40; see also R. v. C. (S.S.), 2008 BCCA 262, 257 B.C.A.C. 57 (B.C. C.A.), at para. 72). In short, courts have explored different ways in which laws run afoul of our basic values, using the same words — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — in slightly different ways.

107 Although there is significant overlap between these three principles, and one law may properly be characterized by more than one of them, arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality remain three distinct principles that stem from what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality" — the situation where the law is "inadequately connected to its objective or in some sense goes too far in seeking to attain it" (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2012), at p. 151). As Peter Hogg has explained:

> The doctrines of overbreadth, disproportionality and arbitrariness are all at bottom intended to address what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality", by which he means that the Court accepts the legislative objective, but scrutinizes the policy instrument enacted as the means to achieve the objective. If the policy instrument is not a rational means to achieve the objective, then the law is dysfunctional in terms of its own objective.

108 The case law on arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality is directed against two different evils. The first evil is the absence of a connection between the infringement of rights and what the law seeks to achieve — the situation where the law's deprivation of an individual's life, liberty, or security of the person is not connected to the purpose of the law. The first evil is addressed by the norms against arbitrariness and overbreadth, which target the absence of connection between the law's purpose and the s. 7 deprivation.

109 The second evil lies in depriving a person of life, liberty or security of the person in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's objective. The law's impact on the s. 7 interest is connected to the purpose, but the impact is so severe that it violates our fundamental norms.

110 Against this background, it may be useful to elaborate on arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality.

111 Arbitrariness asks whether there is a direct connection between the purpose of the law and the impugned effect on the individual, in the sense that the effect on the individual bears some relation to the law's purpose. There must be a rational connection between the object of the measure that causes the s. 7 deprivation, and the limits it imposes on life, liberty, or security of the person (Stewart, at p. 136). A law that imposes limits on these interests in a way that bears no connection to its objective arbitrarily impinges on those interests. Thus, in Chaoulli, the law was arbitrary because the prohibition of private health insurance was held to be unrelated to the objective of protecting the public health system.

112 Overbreadth deals with a law that is so broad in scope that it includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose. In this sense, the law is arbitrary in part. At its core, overbreadth addresses the situation where there is no rational connection between the purposes of the law and some, but not all, of its impacts. For instance, the law at issue in Demers required unfit accused to attend repeated review board hearings. The law was only disconnected from its purpose insofar as it applied to permanently unfit accused; for temporarily unfit accused, the effects were related to the purpose.

113 Overbreadth allows courts to recognize that the law is rational in some cases, but that it overreaches in its effect in others. Despite this recognition of the scope of the law as a whole, the focus remains on the individual and whether the effect on the individual is rationally connected to the law's purpose. For example, where a law is drawn broadly and targets some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose in order to make enforcement more practical, there is still no connection between the purpose of the law and its effect on the specific individual. Enforcement practicality may be a justification for an overbroad law, to be analyzed under s. 1 of the Charter.

114 It has been suggested that overbreadth is not truly a distinct principle of fundamental justice. The case law has sometimes said that overbreadth straddles both arbitrariness and gross disproportionality. Thus, in Heywood, Cory J. stated: "The effect of overbreadth is that in some applications the law is arbitrary or disproportionate" (p. 793).

115 And in R. v. Clay, 2003 SCC 75, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 735 (S.C.C.), the companion case to Malmo-Levine, Gonthier and Binnie JJ. explained:

> Overbreadth in that respect addresses the potential infringement of fundamental justice where the adverse effect of a legislative measure on the individuals subject to its strictures is grossly disproportionate to the state interest the legislation seeks to protect. Overbreadth in this aspect is, as Cory J. pointed out [in Heywood], related to arbitrariness. [Emphasis deleted; para. 38.]

116 In part this debate is semantic. The law has not developed by strict labels, but on a case-by-case basis, as courts identified laws that were inherently bad because they violated our basic values.

117 Moving forward, however, it may be helpful to think of overbreadth as a distinct principle of fundamental justice related to arbitrariness, in that the question for both is whether there is no connection between the effects of a law and its objective. Overbreadth simply allows the court to recognize that the lack of connection arises in a law that goes too far by sweeping conduct into its ambit that bears no relation to its objective.

118 An ancillary question, which applies to both arbitrariness and overbreadth, concerns how significant the lack of correspondence between the objective of the infringing provision and its effects must be. Questions have arisen as to whether a law is arbitrary or overbroad when its effects are inconsistent with its objective, or whether, more broadly, a law is arbitrary or overbroad whenever its effects are unnecessary for its objective (see, e.g., Chaoulli, at paras. 233-34).

119 As noted above, the root question is whether the law is inherently bad because there is no connection, in whole or in part, between its effects and its purpose. This standard is not easily met. The evidence may, as in Morgentaler, show that the effect actually undermines the objective and is therefore "inconsistent" with the objective. Or the evidence may, as in Chaoulli, show that there is simply no connection on the facts between the effect and the objective, and the effect is therefore "unnecessary". Regardless of how the judge describes this lack of connection, the ultimate question remains whether the evidence establishes that the law violates basic norms because there is no connection between its effect and its purpose. This is a matter to be determined on a case-by-case basis, in light of the evidence.

120 Gross disproportionality asks a different question from arbitrariness and overbreadth. It targets the second fundamental evil: the law's effects on life, liberty or security of the person are so grossly disproportionate to its purposes that they cannot rationally be supported. The rule against gross disproportionality only applies in extreme cases where the seriousness of the deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective of the measure. This idea is captured by the hypothetical of a law with the purpose of keeping the streets clean that imposes a sentence of life imprisonment for spitting on the sidewalk. The connection between the draconian impact of the law and its object must be entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society.

121 Gross disproportionality under s. 7 of the Charter does not consider the beneficial effects of the law for society. It balances the negative effect on the individual against the purpose of the law, not against societal benefit that might flow from the law. As this Court said in Malmo-Levine:

> In effect, the exercise undertaken by Braidwood J.A. was to balance the law's salutary and deleterious effects. In our view, with respect, that is a function that is more properly reserved for s. 1. These are the types of social and economic harms that generally have no place in s. 7. [para. 181]

122 Thus, gross disproportionality is not concerned with the number of people who experience grossly disproportionate effects; a grossly disproportionate effect on one person is sufficient to violate the norm.

123 All three principles — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. That is, they do not look to how well the law achieves its object, or to how much of the population the law benefits. They do not consider ancillary benefits to the general population. Furthermore, none of the principles measure the percentage of the population that is negatively impacted. The analysis is qualitative, not quantitative. The question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently bad; a grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s. 7.

The Relationship Between Section 7 and Section 1

124 This Court has previously identified parallels between the rules against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality under s. 7 and elements of the s. 1 analysis for justification of laws that violate Charter rights. These parallels should not be allowed to obscure the crucial differences between the two sections.

125 Section 7 and s. 1 ask different questions. The question under s. 7 is whether the law's negative effect on life, liberty, or security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. With respect to the principles of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality, the specific questions are whether the law's purpose, taken at face value, is connected to its effects and whether the negative effect is grossly disproportionate to the law's purpose. Under s. 1, the question is different — whether the negative impact of a law on the rights of individuals is proportionate to the pressing and substantial goal of the law in furthering the public interest. The question of justification on the basis of an overarching public goal is at the heart of s. 1, but it plays no part in the s. 7 analysis, which is concerned with the narrower question of whether the impugned law infringes individual rights.

126 As a consequence of the different questions they address, s. 7 and s. 1 work in different ways. Under s. 1, the government bears the burden of showing that a law that breaches an individual's rights can be justified having regard to the government's goal. Because the question is whether the broader public interest justifies the infringement of individual rights, the law's goal must be pressing and substantial. The "rational connection" branch of the s. 1 analysis asks whether the law was a rational means for the legislature to pursue its objective. "Minimal impairment" asks whether the legislature could have designed a law that infringes rights to a lesser extent; it considers the legislature's reasonable alternatives. At the final stage of the s. 1 analysis, the court is required to weigh the negative impact of the law on people's rights against the beneficial impact of the law in terms of achieving its goal for the greater public good. The impacts are judged both qualitatively and quantitatively. Unlike individual claimants, the Crown is well placed to call the social science and expert evidence required to justify the law's impact in terms of society as a whole.

127 By contrast, under s. 7, the claimant bears the burden of establishing that the law deprives her of life, liberty or security of the person, in a manner that is not connected to the law's object or in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's object. The inquiry into the purpose of the law focuses on the nature of the object, not on its efficacy. The inquiry into the impact on life, liberty or security of the person is not quantitative — for example, how many people are negatively impacted — but qualitative. An arbitrary, overbroad, or grossly disproportionate impact on one person suffices to establish a breach of s. 7. To require s. 7 claimants to establish the efficacy of the law versus its deleterious consequences on members of society as a whole, would impose the government's s. 1 burden on claimants under s. 7. That cannot be right.

128 In brief, although the concepts under s. 7 and s. 1 are rooted in similar concerns, they are analytically distinct.

129 It has been said that a law that violates s. 7 is unlikely to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter (Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518). The significance of the fundamental rights protected by s. 7 supports this observation. Nevertheless, the jurisprudence has also recognized that there may be some cases where s. 1 has a role to play (see, e.g., Malmo-Levine, at paras. 96-98). Depending on the importance of the legislative goal and the nature of the s. 7 infringement in a particular case, the possibility that the government could establish that a s. 7 violation is justified under s. 1 of the Charter cannot be discounted.

Do the Impugned Laws Respect the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

Section 210: The Bawdy-House Prohibition

(i) The Object of the Provision

130 The bawdy-house provision has remained essentially unchanged since it was moved to Part V of the Criminal Code, "Disorderly Houses, Gaming and Betting", in the 1953-54 Code revision (c. 51, s. 182). In R. v. Rockert, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 704 (S.C.C.), Estey J. found "little, if any, doubt" in the authorities that the disorderly house provisions were not directed at the mischief of betting, gaming and prostitution per se, but rather at the harm to the community in which such activities were carried on in a notorious and habitual manner (p. 712). This objective can be traced back to the common law origins of the bawdy-house provisions (see, e.g., E. Coke, The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England: Concerning High Treason, and Other Pleas of the Crown and Criminal Causes (1817, first published 1644, at pp. 205-6).

131 The appellant Attorneys General argue that the object of this provision, considered alone and in conjunction with the other prohibitions, is to deter prostitution. The record does not support this contention; on the contrary, it is clear from the legislative record that the purpose of the prohibition is to prevent community harms in the nature of nuisance.

132 There is no evidence to support a reappraisal of this purpose by Parliament. The doctrine against shifting objectives does not permit a new object to be introduced at this point (R. v. Zundel, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 731 (S.C.C.)). On its face, the provision is only directed at in-call prostitution, and so cannot be said to aim at deterring prostitution generally. To find that it operates with the other Criminal Code provisions to deter prostitution generally is also unwarranted, given their piecemeal evolution and patchwork construction, which leaves out-calls and prostitution itself untouched. I therefore agree with the lower courts that the objectives of the bawdy-house provision are to combat neighbourhood disruption or disorder and to safeguard public health and safety.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

133 The courts below considered whether the bawdy-house prohibition is overbroad, or grossly disproportionate.

134 I agree with them that the negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective. I therefore find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition is overbroad insofar as it applies to a single prostitute operating out of her own home (C.A., at para. 204). The application judge found on the evidence that moving to a bawdy-house would improve prostitutes' safety by providing "the safety benefits of proximity to others, familiarity with surroundings, security staff, closed-circuit television and other such monitoring that a permanent indoor location can facilitate" (para. 427). Balancing this against the evidence demonstrating that "complaints about nuisance arising from indoor prostitution establishments are rare" (ibid.), she found that the harmful impact of the provision was grossly disproportionate to its purpose.

135 The Court of Appeal acknowledged that empirical evidence on the subject is difficult to gather, since almost all the studies focus on street prostitution. However, it concluded that the evidence supported the application judge's findings on gross disproportionality — in particular, the evidence of the high homicide rate among prostitutes, with the overwhelming number of victims being street prostitutes. The Court of Appeal agreed that moving indoors amounts to a "basic safety precaution" for prostitutes, one which the bawdy-house provision makes illegal (paras. 206-7).

136 In my view, this conclusion was not in error. The harms identified by the courts below are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption that is the object of the law. Parliament has the power to regulate against nuisances, but not at the cost of the health, safety and lives of prostitutes. A law that prevents street prostitutes from resorting to a safe haven such as Grandma's House while a suspected serial killer prowls the streets, is a law that has lost sight of its purpose.

Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

(iii) The Object of the Provision

137 This Court has held, per Cory J. for the majority in Downey, that the purpose of this provision is to target pimps and the parasitic, exploitative conduct in which they engage:

> It can be seen that the majority of offences outlined in s. 195 are aimed at the procurer who entices, encourages or importunes a person to engage in prostitution. Section 195(1)(j) [now s. 212(1)(j)] is specifically aimed at those who have an economic stake in the earnings of a prostitute. It has been held correctly I believe that the target of s. 195(1)(j) is the person who lives parasitically off a prostitute's earnings. That person is commonly and aptly termed a pimp. [p. 32]

138 The Attorneys General of Canada and Ontario argue that the true objective of s. 212(1)(j) is to target the commercialization of prostitution, and to promote the values of dignity and equality. This characterization of the objective does not accord with Downey, and is not supported by the legislative record. It must be rejected.

(iv) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

139 The courts below concluded that the living on the avails provision is overbroad insofar as it captures a number of non-exploitative relationships which are not connected to the law's purpose. The courts below also concluded that the provision's negative effect on the security and safety of prostitutes is grossly disproportionate to its objective of protecting prostitutes from harm.

140 I agree with the courts below that the living on the avails provision is overbroad.

141 The provision has been judicially restricted to those who provide a service or good to a prostitute because she is a prostitute, thus excluding grocers and doctors, for instance (Shaw v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1961), [1962] A.C. 220 (U.K. H.L.)). It also has been held to require that exploitation be proven in the case of a person who lives with the prostitute, in order to exclude people in legitimate domestic relationships with a prostitute (Grilo). These refinements render the prohibition narrower than its words might suggest.

142 The question here is whether the law nevertheless goes too far and thus deprives the applicants of their security of the person in a manner unconnected to the law's objective. The law punishes everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit prostitutes (for example, controlling and abusive pimps) and those who could increase the safety and security of prostitutes (for example, legitimate drivers, managers, or bodyguards). It also includes anyone involved in business with a prostitute, such as accountants or receptionists. In these ways, the law includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose of preventing the exploitation of prostitutes. The living on the avails provision is therefore overbroad.

143 The appellant Attorneys General argue that the line between an exploitative pimp and a prostitute's legitimate driver, manager or bodyguard, blurs in the real world. A relationship that begins on a non-exploitative footing may become exploitative over time. If the provision were tailored more narrowly — for example, by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" as the Court of Appeal did — evidentiary difficulties may lead to exploiters escaping liability. Relationships of exploitation often involve intimidation and manipulation of the kind that make it very difficult for a prostitute to testify. For these reasons, the Attorneys General argue, the provision must be drawn broadly in order to effectively capture those it targets.

144 This argument is more appropriately addressed under the s. 1 analysis. As stated above, if a law captures conduct that bears no relation to its purpose, the law is overbroad under s. 7; enforcement practicality is one way the government may justify an overbroad law under s. 1 of the Charter.

145 Having found that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution is overbroad, I find it unnecessary to consider whether it is also grossly disproportionate to its object of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in Public for the Purposes of Prostitution

(v) The Object of the Provision

146 The object of the communicating provision was explained by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference:

> Like Wilson J., I would characterize the legislative objective of s. 195.1(1)(c) [now s. 213(1)(c)] in the following manner: the provision is meant to address solicitation in public places and, to that end, seeks to eradicate the various forms of social nuisance arising from the public display of the sale of sex. My colleague Lamer J. finds that s. 195.1(1)(c) is truly directed towards curbing the exposure of prostitution and related violence, drugs and crime to potentially vulnerable young people, and towards eliminating the victimization and economic disadvantage that prostitution, and especially street soliciting, represents for women. I do not share the view that the legislative objective can be characterized so broadly. In prohibiting sales of sexual services in public, the legislation does not attempt, at least in any direct manner, to address the exploitation, degradation and subordination of women that are part of the contemporary reality of prostitution. Rather, in my view, the legislation is aimed at taking solicitation for the purposes of prostitution off the streets and out of public view.
> The Criminal Code provision subject to attack in these proceedings clearly responds to the concerns of home-owners, businesses, and the residents of urban neighbourhoods. Public solicitation for the purposes of prostitution is closely associated with street congestion and noise, oral harassment of non-participants and general detrimental effects on passers-by or bystanders, especially children. [pp. 1134-35]

147 It is clear from these reasons that the purpose of the communicating provision is not to eliminate street prostitution for its own sake, but to take prostitution "off the streets and out of public view" in order to prevent the nuisances that street prostitution can cause. The Prostitution Reference belies the Attorneys General's argument that Parliament's overall objective in these provisions is to deter prostitution.

(vi) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

148 The application judge concluded that the harm imposed by the prohibition on communicating in public was grossly disproportionate to the provision's object of removing the nuisance of prostitution from the streets. This was based on evidence that she found established that the ability to screen clients was an "essential tool" to avoiding violent or drunken clients (application decision, at para. 432).

149 The majority of the Court of Appeal found that the application judge erred in her analysis of gross disproportionality by attaching too little importance to the objective of s. 213(1)(c), and by incorrectly finding on the evidence that face-to-face communication with a prospective customer is essential to enhancing prostitutes' safety (at paras. 306 and 310).

150 In my view, the Court of Appeal majority's reasoning on this question is problematic, largely for the reasons set out by MacPherson J.A., dissenting in part. Four aspects of the majority's analysis are particularly troubling.

151 First, in concluding that the application judge accorded too little weight to the legislative objective of s. 213(1)(c), the majority of the Court of Appeal criticized her characterization of the object of the provision as targeting "noise, street congestion, and the possibility that the practice of prostitution will interfere with those nearby" (C.A., at para. 306). But the application judge's conclusion was in concert with the object of s. 213(1)(c) established by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference, which the majority of the Court of Appeal endorsed earlier in their reasons (at para. 286).

152 Compounding this error, the majority of the Court of Appeal inflated the objective of the prohibition on public communication by referring to "drug possession, drug trafficking, public intoxication, and organized crime" (para. 307), even though Dickson C.J. explicitly excluded the exposure of "related violence, drugs and crime" to vulnerable young people from the objectives of s. 213(1)(c). At most, the provision's effect on these other issues is an ancillary benefit — and, as such, it should not play into the gross disproportionality analysis, which weighs the actual objective of the provision against its negative impact on the individual's life, liberty and security of the person.

153 The three remaining concerns with the majority's reasoning relate to the other side of the balance: the assessment of the impact of the provision.

154 First, the majority of the Court of Appeal erroneously substituted its assessment of the evidence for that of the application judge. It found that the application judge's conclusion that face-to-face communication is essential to enhancing prostitutes' safety was based only on "anecdotal evidence ... informed by her own common sense" (para. 311). This was linked to its error, discussed above, in according too little deference to the application judge on findings of social and legislative facts. MacPherson J.A. for the minority, correctly countered that the evidence on this point came from both prostitutes' own accounts and from expert assessments, and provided a firm basis for the application judge's conclusion (at paras. 348-50).

155 Second, the majority ignored the law's effect of displacing prostitutes to more secluded, less secure locations. The application judge highlighted this displacement (at para. 331), citing the evidence found in the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights Subcommittee on Solicitation Laws (The Challenge of Change: A Study of Canada's Criminal Prostitution Laws (2006)) on the effects of s. 213(1)(c). The majority's conclusion that the application judge did not have a proper basis to conclude that face-to-face communication enhances safety may be explained in part by their failure to consider the impact of the provision on displacement.

156 Related to this is the uncontested fact that the communication ban prevents street workers from bargaining for conditions that would materially reduce their risk, such as condom use and the use of safe houses.

157 Finally, the majority of the Court of Appeal majority, in rejecting the application judge's conclusions, relied on its own speculative assessment of the impact of s. 213(1)(c):

> While it is fair to say that a street prostitute might be able to avoid a "bad date" by negotiating details such as payment, services to be performed and condom use up front, it is equally likely that the customer could pass muster at an early stage, only to turn violent once the transaction is underway. It is also possible that the prostitute may proceed even in the face of perceived danger, either because her judgment is impaired by drugs or alcohol, or because she is so desperate for money that she feels compelled to take the risk. [para. 312]

158 It is certainly conceivable, as this passage suggests, that some street prostitutes would not refuse a client even if communication revealed potential danger. It is also conceivable that the danger may not be perfectly predicted in advance. However, that does not negate the application judge's finding that communication is an essential tool that can decrease risk. The assessment is qualitative, not quantitative. If screening could have prevented one woman from jumping into Robert Pickton's car, the severity of the harmful effects is established.

159 In sum, the Court of Appeal wrongly attributed errors in reasoning to the application judge and made a number of errors in considering gross disproportionality. I would restore the application judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) is grossly disproportionate. The provision's negative impact on the safety and lives of street prostitutes is a grossly disproportionate response to the possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution.

Do the Prohibitions Against Communicating in Public Violate Section 2(b) of the Charter?

160 Having concluded that the impugned laws violate s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider this question.

Are the Infringements Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

161 The appellant Attorneys General have not seriously argued that the laws, if found to infringe s. 7, can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Only the Attorney General of Canada addressed this in his factum, and then, only briefly. I therefore find it unnecessary to engage in a full s. 1 analysis for each of the impugned provisions. However, some of their arguments under s. 7 of the Charter are properly addressed at this stage of the analysis.

162 In particular, the Attorneys General attempt to justify the living on the avails provision on the basis that it must be drafted broadly in order to capture all exploitative relationships, which can be difficult to identify. However, the law not only catches drivers and bodyguards, who may actually be pimps, but it also catches clearly non-exploitative relationships, such as receptionists or accountants who work with prostitutes. The law is therefore not minimally impairing. Nor, at the final stage of the s. 1 inquiry, is the law's effect of preventing prostitutes from taking measures that would increase their safety, and possibly save their lives, outweighed by the law's positive effect of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

163 The Attorneys General have not raised any other arguments distinct from those considered under s. 7. I therefore find that the impugned laws are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

V. Result and Remedy

164 I would dismiss the appeals and allow the cross-appeal. Section 210, as it relates to prostitution, and ss. 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) are declared to be inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and hence are void. The word 'prostitution' is struck from the definition of 'common bawdy-house' in s. 197(1) of the Criminal Code as it applies to s. 210 only.

165 I have concluded that each of the challenged provisions, considered independently, suffers from constitutional infirmities that violate the Charter. That does not mean that Parliament is precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted. Prohibitions on keeping a bawdy-house, living on the avails of prostitution and communication related to prostitution are intertwined. They impact on each other. Greater latitude in one measure — for example, permitting prostitutes to obtain the assistance of security personnel — might impact on the constitutionality of another measure — for example, forbidding the nuisances associated with keeping a bawdy-house. The regulation of prostitution is a complex and delicate matter. It will be for Parliament, should it choose to do so, to devise a new approach, reflecting different elements of the existing regime.

166 This raises the question of whether the declaration of invalidity should be suspended and if so, for how long.

167 On the one hand, immediate invalidity would leave prostitution totally unregulated while Parliament grapples with the complex and sensitive problem of how to deal with it. How prostitution is regulated is a matter of great public concern, and few countries leave it entirely unregulated. Whether immediate invalidity would pose a danger to the public or imperil the rule of law (the factors for suspension referred to in Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679 (S.C.C.)) may be subject to debate. However, it is clear that moving abruptly from a situation where prostitution is regulated to a situation where it is entirely unregulated would be a matter of great concern to many Canadians.

168 On the other hand, leaving the prohibitions against bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution and public communication for purposes of prostitution in place in their present form leaves prostitutes at increased risk for the time of the suspension — risks which violate their constitutional right to security of the person.

169 The choice between suspending the declaration of invalidity and allowing it to take immediate effect is not an easy one. Neither alternative is without difficulty. However, considering all the interests at stake, I conclude that the declaration of invalidity should be suspended for one year.

Appeals dismissed; cross-appeal allowed.

Pourvois rejetés; pourvoi incident accueilli.

Footnotes

* Corrigenda issued by the Court on January 16 and 20, 2014 have been incorporated herein.

1 The focus is on security of the person, not liberty, for three reasons. First, the Prostitution Reference decided that the communicating and bawdy-house provisions engage liberty, and it is binding on this point. The security of the person argument is a novel issue and an important reason why the application judge was able to revisit the Prostitution Reference. Second, it is not clear that any of the applicants' personal liberty interests are engaged by the living on the avails provision; rather, they have pleaded that they fear that it could apply to their employees or their loved ones. Lastly, it seems to me that the real gravamen of the complaint is not that breaking the law engages the applicants' liberty, but rather that compliance with the laws infringes the applicants' security of the person.

Criminal Law --- Dangerous offender — Miscellaneous

Extended sentence where no dangerous offender application.

Sentencing — Principles — Fixed sentences not capped at 20 years — Sentencing judge having discretion to set just and appropriate sentence reflecting traditional goals subject to principle of proportionality.

Sentencing — Principles — Retribution being accepted principle of sentencing but must be distinguished from vengeance.

Sentencing — Considerations on sentencing — Possibility of parole — Effect of parole eligibility rules not constraining trial judge's discretion by capping fixed sentences at 20 years — Sentencing judge having discretion to set just and appropriate sentence reflecting traditional goals subject to principle of proportionality.

Sentencing — Appeals — Standard of review being whether sentence demonstrably unfit absent error in principle, failure to consider relevant factor or overemphasis of appropriate factors.

Appeals — Sentence appeals — Standard of review being whether sentence demonstrably unfit absent error in principle, failure to consider relevant factor or overemphasis of appropriate factors.

Appeals — Appeals to Supreme Court of Canada — Court having discretion to award costs but not conventionally done in criminal cases — Case not being remarkable or oppressive — Crown's conduct not being improper.

The accused was sentenced to a term of 25 years after pleading guilty to numerous counts of sexual assault, incest, assault with a weapon and other lesser offences arising from a pattern of sexual, emotional and physical abuse inflicted on his children over a period of years. The accused was 55 years old with no previous criminal record. He came from a dysfunctional background which included sexual abuse. The Crown had argued that 30 years was warranted in light of the devastating pattern of abuse and the questionable prospects for rehabilitation. On appeal, the total sentence was reduced to 18 years and 8 months on the basis that, where a life sentence is not available, the principle of totality places a ceiling on fixed-term cumulative sentences at a term of 20 years. The Crown appealed.

Held:

The appeal was allowed; the sentence of 25 years was restored.

Although Canadian courts have been reluctant to impose sentences totalling more than 20 years, Parliament has not placed a numerical cap on fixed-term sentences. Subject to stipulated maxima and minima, the sentencing judge is given considerable latitude in determining the appropriate period of incarceration which advances the goals of sentencing and reflects the offender's culpability. Parliament intended to vest trial judges with a wide ambit of authority to impose a sentence which is just and appropriate and which adequately advances the core sentencing objectives of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society. The principle of proportionality requires that the quantum of sentence should be commensurate with the gravity of the offence and the moral blameworthiness of the offender. The principle of proportionality expresses itself as a constitutional obligation since a sentence that is so grossly disproportionate as to outrage standards of decency will violate s. 12 of the Charter. In the context of consecutive sentences, proportionality expresses itself through the totality principle which requires that the cumulative sentence not exceed the overall culpability of the offender. Only rarely have Canadian courts sustained sentences totalling more than 20 years.

There is no evidence that Parliament intended to constrain a sentencing judge's discretion by imposing a numerical ceiling on sentences at 20 years. Some appellate courts have fashioned a qualified ceiling rule which limits sentences to 20 years barring special circumstances that warrant a more onerous sentence. The next step up in the sentencing process would be life imprisonment. The principal argument in support of this rule arises from the applicable parole eligibility provisions which provide that a person serving a life sentence as a maximum punishment is eligible for parole after serving seven years from the date of arrest. For a fixed-term sentence, parole eligibility is set fractionally at one-third of the sentence of imprisonment calculated from the date of imposition to a limit of seven years. Accordingly, it has been argued that Parliament considers a fixed sentence beyond 21 years as largely irrelevant. Parliament established the parole system as a regime by which the conditions of incarceration could be altered by subsequent executive review rather than as a system by which a sentence could be reduced. There is no indication that parole eligibility rules were intended to constrain a court's ability to impose sentences beyond 20 years. The Corrections and Conditional Release Act was enacted to establish an administrative regime for executing and implementing the scheme of discretionary punishments authorized by the Criminal Code, not to restrict the sentencing discretion of trial judges. The history, structure and existing practice of the conditional release system indicates that parole represents a change in the conditions under which a sentence is served, not a reduction of the sentence. The setting of parole eligibility rules is animated by the sentencing goals of deterrence and denunciation. While one can infer that Parliament concluded that deterrence and denunciation require only a seven-year eligibility threshold, that does not mean that a court's ability to advance the goals of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and protection of society are exhausted by a sentence of 20 years. The sentencing judge should be mindful of the age of an offender in applying relevant rules of sentencing. The utilitarian and normative goals of sentencing will eventually begin to exhaust themselves once a contemplated sentence surpasses any reasonable estimation of the offender's remaining natural life span.

Retribution is an accepted and important principle of sentencing. While its legitimacy was questioned in the Court of Appeal, this did not play a significant or decisive role in the reduction of the sentence. Retribution represents the hallowed principle that criminal punishment, in addition to advancing utilitarian considerations related to deterrence and rehabilitation, should be imposed to sanction the moral culpability of the offender. Retribution is woven into the principles of sentencing through the requirement that the sentence be "just and appropriate". Retribution offers the conceptual link between criminal liability and the criminal sanction through the recognition of moral blameworthiness. Retribution bears little resemblance to vengeance. Vengeance is an uncalibrated act of harm upon another motivated by emotion and anger, while retribution is an objective, reasoned and measured determination of an appropriate punishment which properly reflects the moral culpability of the offender having regard to the intentional risk-taking, the consequential harm and the normative character of the offender's conduct. Retribution incorporates the principle of restraint. It is conceptually distinct from denunciation because it requires the sentence to reflect the moral blameworthiness of the particular offender as compared to a denunciation of the offender's conduct. A sentence with a denunciatory element represents a symbolic, collective statement that the offender's conduct should be punished for encroaching upon society's code of values as enshrined within our criminal law. In the justice system, normative and utilitarian considerations operate in conjunction with one another to provide a coherent justification for punishment. Retribution must be considered in conjunction with other legitimate sentencing objectives, the weight and importance of which will vary depending on the nature of the crime and the circumstances of the offender.

The Crown was not required to invoke dangerous offender proceedings rather than seek an extended period of incarceration. Although the majority of the Court of Appeal did suggest that, once the Crown had chosen not to invoke dangerous offender proceedings, an extended term of imprisonment should not be imposed based on dangerousness and protection of society, these remarks did not substantially contribute to the reduction of the sentence and did not constitute a reversible error. The issue of whether there are circumstances where a stringent fixed term motivated exclusively by dangerousness should be available to circumvent the substantive and procedural protections of Pt. XXIV of the Code should be left for another day.

A court of appeal should intervene to vary a sentence imposed at trial only if the sentence is demonstrably unfit absent an error in principle, failure to consider a relevant factor or an overemphasis of the appropriate factors. Sentencing judges are vested with the discretion to determine the appropriate degree and kind of punishment, and courts of appeal should apply a deferential standard of review. A sentencing judge who has presided over the trial and sentencing enjoys an advantage over an appellate judge, who only has the benefit of written and oral submissions. A sentencing judge also has experience in the front lines and in the local community where the consequences of the offence are felt. Appellate courts play an important role in minimizing disparity but must still exercise a margin of deference. Sentences should be expected to vary between communities and regions. A court of appeal should intervene where the sentence is a substantial and marked departure from the sentences customarily imposed for similar offenders committing similar crimes. Here, the Court of Appeal engaged in an overly interventionist mode of review when, notwithstanding empirical studies on general deterrence, it was open to the sentencing judge to conclude that the particular blend of sentencing goals warranted a sentence of 25 years.

Although s. 47 of the Supreme Court Act provides a discretion to award costs in a criminal case, the general convention is that a criminal defendant, whether successful or not, is generally not entitled to costs. Here, there was nothing remarkable about the accused's case or any oppressive or improper conduct on the part of the Crown. The accused should not be awarded costs.

Words and phrases considered:

RETRIBUTION

Retribution, as an objective of sentencing, represents nothing less than the hallowed principle that criminal punishment, in addition to advancing utilitarian considerations related to deterrence and rehabilitation, should also be imposed to sanction the moral culpability of the offender.

. . . retribution bears little relation to vengeance . . . Vengeance . . . represents an uncalibrated act of harm upon another, frequently motivated by emotion or anger, as a reprisal for harm inflicted upon oneself by that person. Retribution in a criminal context, by contrast, represents an objective, reasoned and measured denunciation of an appropriate punishment which properly reflects the moral culpability of the offender, having regard to the intentional risk-taking of the offender, the consequential harm caused by the offender, and the normative character of the offender's conduct. Furthermore, unlike vengeance, retribution incorporates a principle of restraint; retribution requires the imposition of a just and appropriate punishment, and nothing more.

Retribution, as well, should be conceptually distinguished from its legitimate sibling, denunciation. Retribution requires that a judicial sentence properly reflects the moral blameworthiness of that particular offender.

TOTALITY PRINCIPLE

The totality principle . . . requires a sentencing judge who orders an offender to serve consecutive sentences for multiple offences to ensure that the cumulative sentence rendered does not extend the overall culpability of the offender.

Appeal from judgment reported at (1994), 28 C.R. (4th) 106, 40 B.C.A.C. 7, 65 W.A.C. 7 (C.A.) allowing accused's appeal to reduce sentence.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Lamer C.J.C.:

1 In 1992, the respondent, C.A.M., pleaded guilty to numerous counts of sexual assault, incest, assault with a weapon, in addition to other lesser offences, arising from a largely uncontested pattern of sexual, physical and emotional abuse inflicted upon his children over a number of years. None of the offences committed by the respondent carried a penalty of life imprisonment. The trial judge, remarking that the offences of the respondent were "as egregious as any offences that I have ever had the occasion to deal with", sentenced him to a cumulative sentence of 25 years, with individual sentences running both consecutively and concurrently. The British Columbia Court of Appeal, however, reduced the sentence of the respondent to 18 years and 8 months: (1994), 28 C.R. (4th) 106, 40 B.C.A.C. 7, 65 W.A.C. 7. Following a line of jurisprudence it had developed in recent years, the Court of Appeal concluded that where life imprisonment is not available as a penalty, the "principle of totality" requires trial judges to limit fixed-term cumulative sentences under the Criminal Code of Canada, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, to a term of imprisonment of 20 years, absent special circumstances. Accordingly, the fundamental issue presented by this appeal concerns whether or not the Court of Appeal erred in law in holding that there is such a qualified ceiling on fixed-term sentences under the Criminal Code.

I. Factual Background

2 The respondent is a 55-year-old man with no prior history of criminal conduct. In 1972, after two previous marriages, the respondent married his third wife (now deceased). During that marriage, he fathered nine children. The children included an older pair of female twins, E.M.M. and J.P.M., born in 1974, and a number of younger male and female children. For most of his life, the respondent worked as a labourer across the Western provinces, alternatively employed as a hard rock miner, a truck driver, a mechanic and an oil field worker. As a result of the transient nature of his employment, the family was somewhat itinerant and moved frequently from locations in Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. In or about February 1987, the family moved to Fort Nelson, B.C., and in or about February, 1988, the family relocated again to Saanich, B.C.

3 On May 14, 1992, a Canada Post letter carrier called the Saanich Police Department to report that he had observed several young children who had been left unattended in distressing living conditions at the respondent's residence. At 1:30 p.m. that day, two police constables visited the residence accompanied by a social services worker. By their accounts, the residence contained no furniture or food, and was filthy. The children were barely clothed, malnourished, and slightly delirious. One constable also noticed numerous long-term scars over the arms and legs of the children. In his report, the same constable described his reaction to the exigent circumstances under which the children were living:

> I have attended hundreds of residences in the past seven and a half years and in my opinion the residence was the worst I had ever seen, and that the children were in need of apprehension.

Upon inquiries, the older children advised the constables that their father, the respondent, had left the home approximately one year before. The respondent, it would later be revealed, had left the residence in 1990 for Fort Nelson, and eventually Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, following separation from his wife. In their ensuing discussions with the constables, the older daughters also began to disclose allegations of past physical and sexual abuse by their father.

4 In the next two days, one of the daughters met with the police constables, at which time she spoke at length concerning the physical and sexual abuse which she had suffered at the hands of the respondent. In the course of the ensuing investigation, the respondent was arrested in Moose Jaw and was returned to Victoria in police custody. On November 30, 1992, the respondent entered a plea of guilty before Filmer Prov. Ct. J. to an amended information which included five counts of assault with a weapon, two counts of assault, two counts of sexual assault, one count of incest and one count of uttering a threat. The respondent was convicted, and the judge ordered psychological and psychiatric evaluations and scheduled a hearing for the purpose of sentencing.

II. Sentencing Submissions

5 On February 8, 1993, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. convened a hearing to entertain submissions as to sentence. Although the respondent had been convicted of a number of serious offences, none of the offences carried life imprisonment as a penalty. The respondent, however, had pleaded guilty to one offence which bore a maximum term of imprisonment of 14 years, and to six offences which carried maximum terms of imprisonment of 10 years, in addition to the remaining lesser offences which carried maximum sentences of 5 years. The Crown, from the outset, requested a cumulative sentence of more than twenty years imprisonment given the magnitude of the respondent's crimes. In its oral and written submissions before the court, the Crown presented a psychological report by a Dr. Malcolm, a psychiatric report by a Dr. Lohrasbe, and written victim impact statements by E.M.M. and J.P.M., among other exhibits including letters and poems written by children. Counsel for the defence, in reply, contended that the Crown's request was excessive and that a sentence of ten to fourteen years was adequate to advance the sentencing goals of deterrence and denunciation. While conceding the "extensive" physical and sexual abuse committed by the respondent, counsel underscored his client's past personal experiences with abuse, his client's willingness to forego a painful trial, and his client's genuine expressions of remorse for his crimes.

6 Given that this appeal implicates questions concerning the reasonableness of the sentence imposed by Filmer Prov. Ct. J., I find it necessary to examine the sentencing submissions of both the Crown and the respondent in some depth in order to illustrate the full gravity of the respondent's crimes.

A. Submissions of the Crown

7 In the course of developing its submissions, the Crown revealed a disturbing, horrific pattern of physical and sexual abuse which the nine children suffered at the hands of the respondent. From 1988 to 1991, it does not appear to be seriously contested that the daily lives of these children were punctuated by cruel, spontaneous acts of aggravated violence perpetrated by their father. Rather than representing a caring figure of love and protection, their father appeared to represent a haunting, malevolent figure who instilled fear in their daily existence.

8 In its pleadings, the Crown described how the four eldest children suffered a long history of physical abuse which consisted of almost daily beatings administered by their father. Although the beatings normally involved the use of open hands, fists and feet, on more serious occasions they included the use of weapons such as steel-toed work boots, knives, belts, broomsticks, electrical cords, tools and (on one alleged occasion) a toaster. Although the children could not identify any discrete point in time during which the beatings began, the physical assaults assumed a regularity in timing and in intensity once the family had moved to Fort Nelson. The beatings did not appear to follow any consistent pattern of motivation on behalf of the respondent; at times, it appears that the respondent was motivated by spontaneous bursts of anger, while other times, the respondent's violence was provoked by superficial excuses related to the misbehaviour or failure of the children, such as the receipt of a poor report card or an incident of bed-wetting.

9 E.M.M., one of the two female twins, suffered some of the most severe abuse. On seemingly countless occasions, she was beaten with the bare hands of the respondent, including being thrown by the respondent against cupboards and down stairs. When the family moved to Victoria, she was subjected to more aggravated assaults involving repetitive whippings with a wet electrical cord, or with a leather belt emblazoned with metal snaps — an instrument the children would learn to call the "Devil's Fang" because the hook of the buckle would cut skin when pulled away. E.M.M. also sustained beatings with miscellaneous household instruments ranging from broomsticks, screwdrivers, wrenches to hammers. According to her accounts, during one egregious incident, the respondent castigated her for burning toast by shoving her face into the hot toaster.

10 By the Crown's description, the other children were similarly forced to endure a regular pattern of fist beatings. The respondent, however, appeared to single out his older children for the most violent abuse. Often, he would force the other children to watch as he targeted one particular child out for corporal punishment. The older children were all exposed to the electric cord whippings. The sheer brutality of the respondent's whippings is clearly conveyed by E.M.M.'s description of the event. As she described one particular incident in her impact statement:

> The cord was doubled and doubled and doubled until the whole thing looked like a bunch of hoops held together. Anyways he started whipping us with it. We still had our wet clothes on but after a few swats he told us to take them off. I remember screaming with every strike, it felt like my whole entire body was being struck by lightning. The pain was so strong it felt like electrical shocks travelling all over my body with every whip. He didn't care where he hit. It landed on our backs, arms, legs, anywhere he pleased. Anyways, he wouldn't stop unless we stopped screaming. ... I managed to stop screaming by biting into my cheeks and tongue finding out afterwards the reason he stopped was because he saw blood. I was bleeding and bruising on my back, buttocks, legs, arms and shoulders, but most of the bleeding and bruising was on my back. [Three of the children] had the same, only [J.P.M.] had it mostly on her legs, [another] had it mostly on his shoulders and arms, [the third] had it mostly on her butt.

One particular daughter suffered additional abuse because she would not (or could not) stop crying during and following her beatings. She was once purportedly hit so many times that she lost consciousness. One son was frequently kicked by the respondent's steel-toed boots in his shins, abdomen and back. J.P.M. was subjected to physical discipline administered with a wrench, a screwdriver and the flat portion of a knife. She still carries an approximately three-inch long scar on her arm when the respondent cut her while she was cleaning dishes.

11 The pain and suffering experienced by the three eldest daughters was magnified by a degrading pattern of sexual abuse inflicted by the respondent. According to the Crown's interviews with the victims, the respondent would watch and fondle all three children as they bathed and dressed themselves. When the family was living in Fort Nelson, both E.M.M. and J.P.M. were forced to masturbate the respondent and perform oral sex on him. E.M.M. recalls one night in Fort Nelson when the respondent had some of his friends over, and the group of men forced her to undress and collectively felt her genitalia. During one particularly disturbing occasion involving J.P.M. (an occasion which the respondent submits he does not recollect), the respondent allegedly invited his friends to the family residence, and permitted his friends to have intercourse with his young daughter in exchange for money. According to J.P.M.'s account of the event, when she resisted, the respondent helped physically restrain his daughter to facilitate the transaction.

12 When the family moved to Saanich in February 1988, the sexual assaults against three older female children became more frequent and grew in intensity. The bathroom fondlings became a regular event in the lives of E.M.M. and J.P.M. and they escalated to include full digital penetration by the respondent. When E.M.M. was about thirteen, she was forced to perform full intercourse with the respondent on a number of occasions in the parents' bedroom. J.P.M. too was compelled to engage in full intercourse with her father on more than one occasion. By her accounts, the accused would sleep in some days and call her into his room to have sex with him before he started his day. J.P.M. recalls that the last incident of intercourse occurred in the spring of 1991 shortly before her father had moved from the province.

13 The suffering and degradation experienced by the children from the physical and sexual abuse was only aggravated by the respondent's persistent, dehumanizing emotional abuse. The respondent exhibited a callous disregard for the emotional well-being of his children. As the Crown described, he would rarely call his offspring by their given names. Rather, he would ordinarily label them collectively according to an obscene expletive. Additionally, the respondent regularly terrorized his children with death threats. According to their statements, there appears to be little doubt that the children were convinced that their father would kill them if they ever discussed the abuse they had experienced under his care.

14 The Crown's submissions and the children's respective impact statements suggest that the abused children will continue to experience the devastating consequences of the respondent's physical, sexual and emotional abuse for a significant time to come. The children appear to live in enduring fear that even if their father is sent to prison, he will eventually return and kill them. As Dr. Lohrasbe indicated in his psychiatric report:

> The family are totally terrorized. They believe that [C.M.] will somehow return to carry out his threats. They are fearful that he will work his way through the correctional system, or escape, and return to carry out his threats. It is unlikely that these fears will subside any time soon.

The children are clearly withdrawn, and they appear to have experienced considerable difficulty in socially adjusting to their environment at school. Perhaps most tragically of all, the children seem to partially blame themselves for the physical and sexual brutality they experienced at the hands of their father. In her statement, E.M.M. rebukes herself for the cruel abuse she has suffered:

> It's driving me crazy! I mean how could I let these people treat me so badly? Why did I allow my body to go through all the torture and the pain? How could I be so stupid?

Dr. Lohrasbe expressed considerable pessimism over whether the children would ever fully recover from the lasting effects of the abuse they had endured. As the doctor expressed his clinical findings in his report: "there is little doubt in my mind that recovery, if it is to occur, will take many, many years".

15 The Crown argued on the basis of the psychological report and the psychiatric report that the respondent enjoys few prospects for rehabilitation. In his report, Dr. Lohrasbe cast serious doubt on the sincerity of the respondent's ex post expressions of remorse. As the expert expressed his view:

> In regards to rehabilitating this man, it is important for me to point out that [C.A.M.] currently shows little interest or motivation in genuine change. His verbal expressions of contrition appear to be little more [than] a contrivance to protect his self-esteem. He is unwilling to acknowledge, never mind change, his more serious acts.

More generally, Dr. Lohrasbe concluded that the respondent experiences "severe and pervasive distortions in his personality that overlap several discrete diagnostic patterns of personality disorder". Accordingly, the psychiatrist was not optimistic about the respondent's possibilities for reform. As the psychiatrist described his diagnostic conclusions:

> The extent and depth of the personality distortions suggest that it is going to be extraordinarily difficult to change this man's attitudes and behaviour. ...
>
> Individuals with less severe syndromes of controlling abuse are still difficult treatment candidates. There is no recognized treatment method by which change can predictably occur. With [C.A.M.], it would be wise to assume that very little, if anything, can be done to examine and eliminate the causes of his offending. It will have to be assumed that, at whatever point he is able to dominate other individuals, he will continue in his controlling and abusive ways.

Dr. Malcolm, the psychologist, generally shared Dr. Lohrasbe's pessimism. As Dr. Malcolm concluded in his report:

> Certainly, therapy should be made available to [the respondent] but at the present time it has not been notable for success in others with this diagnostic pattern. Sadly, given [the respondent's] long history of abusing all three of his wives and many of his children it is difficult to presume that his aggressiveness towards others, especially family members, would diminish. ... There is no present reason to assume that this pattern would change without intensive therapy which may well, as noted, be unsuccessful.

16 Accordingly, in light of the devastating pattern of physical, sexual and emotional abuse the respondent inflicted upon his children, and in light of the respondent's questionable prospects for rehabilitation, the Crown requested a stringent term of imprisonment in excess of 20 years. The Crown was of the view that a term of 30 years might even be warranted by the crimes of the respondent.

B. Submissions of Counsel for the Defence

17 In his submissions, counsel for the defence largely accepted the Crown's account of the physical and sexual abuse committed by the respondent. It was admitted that "there can be no doubt" that the abuse visited by the respondent upon his children was both "extensive" and "terrible". Counsel, however, did take issue with some of the particular allegations of the Crown. While the respondent recalls striking and kicking the children on numerous occasions, including with the electrical cord, he could not recall assaulting the children with a knife or a screwdriver. Furthermore, in relation to the sexual abuse, contrary to the Crown's suggestion, he asserted that he only had sexual intercourse with E.M.M. and J.P.M. on a few discrete occasions. He also denied recollection of the incident during which he purportedly held down J.P.M. for the benefit of his friends. But on the whole, the respondent did not seriously dispute the larger pattern of physical, sexual and emotional abuse depicted by the Crown.

18 Counsel did, however, spend considerable effort in calling attention to the mitigating circumstances surrounding the respondent's crimes. To begin, counsel underscored the respondent's dysfunctional childhood and troubled youth. As a result of recently revived memories which had allegedly been repressed, C.A.M. contends that he has discovered that he himself was a victim of sexual abuse at a very early age. He also emphasized the long-term trauma he has suffered in relation to two near-death experiences, one in relation to a serious automobile accident, and one in relation to "mine gassings" which occurred while he was working as a miner.

19 In addition to the foregoing factors, the respondent also stressed his advanced age, and his willingness to plead guilty to almost all of the counts of the information in order to avoid having his children endure the pain of a lengthy trial. As well, it was contended through counsel that responsibility for the abuse of the children ought to be shared with his deceased wife; in his characterization of the relevant events, the mother was a "willing participant" in the physical beatings of the children. Finally, he represented that he was genuinely remorseful for his crimes. In light of all these factors, counsel for the defence submitted that an appropriate term of imprisonment should be set at ten to fourteen years.

III. Judgments Below

A. Provincial Court

20 At the outset, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. commented that the crimes of the respondent were "as egregious as any offenses that I have ever had the occasion to deal with, either as counsel or in these courts". He further remarked that "[t]his matter transcends what I would consider the parameters of the worst case". However, he noted that none of the respondent's offences carried life imprisonment as an available punishment. Furthermore, he took cognizance of two recent rulings of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in R. v. Rooke, B.C.C.A., Victoria Registry VO00354 and VO00355, February 9, 1990, [1990] B.C.J. No. 643, and R. v. D. (G. W.), Vancouver Registry CA009244, March 8, 1990, [1990] B.C.J. No. 728 (sub nom. R. v. D.), which held that where life imprisonment is available as a punishment but is not imposed, the maximum numerical sentence available under the Criminal Code is 20 years imprisonment, absent special circumstances warranting a more onerous sentence.

21 Filmer Prov. Ct. J. concluded that the qualified ceiling on sentences established in Rooke and D. (G. W.) did not apply in this instance, as the ratio decidendi of that line of jurisprudence was limited to circumstances where life imprisonment was available as penalty. Accordingly, he held that he could consider sentences which exceeded 20 years.

22 Filmer Prov. Ct. J. found that, based on the psychological and psychiatric reports, "therapy in this particular matter, if it is to be successful at all, will take a protracted period of time". He then stressed the "extremely high" and "shocking" level of violence exhibited in the respondent's physical and sexual abuse, and the "devastating consequences to the victims" resulting from the abuse. With these factors in mind, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. concluded that a cumulative sentence of 25 years, with no credit for time served, was appropriate and just. As he reasoned:

> [The circumstances of this case] fit[] all of the criteria of the serious side of this type of offence. It is in the extreme upper limits. ...
>
> It is my view that the sentence in this particular case must exceed twenty years. ... I know I potentially walk in harm's way if the Court of Appeal feels that their dictate is that a sentence that is not a life sentence should only in very limited circumstances not exceed twenty years. ...
>
> I intend to use a sentence in this particular matter that, in my view, will give the parole system an opportunity to function appropriately. I think they require a significant period of rehabilitation, of counselling ... in this man's best interests.

23 To give effect to this aggregate sentence, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. structured his sentencing order according to the following terms, with a number of particular sentences running concurrently.

Consecutive Sentences

Offence	Criminal Code Provision	Max. Statutory Sentence (Years)	Sentence Imposed (Years)
Sexual Assault	s. 271	10	8
Incest	s. 155(1)	14	7
Sexual Assault	s. 271	10	5
Assault w/Weapon	s. 267(1)	10	5
Total	-	-	25

Concurrent Sentences

Offence	Criminal Code Provision	Max. Statutory Sentence (Years)	Sentence Imposed (Years)
Assault w/Weapon	s. 267(1)	10	3
Assault w/Weapon (Three Counts)	s. 267(1)	10 (for each)	6 (total)
Common Assault	s. 266	5	3

Common Assault	s. 266	5	2
Threatening	s. 264.1(1)(a)	5	1
Total	-	-	15

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal (1994), 28 C.R. (4th) 106

24 In contrast to Filmer Prov. Ct. J., the majority of the Court of Appeal held that the qualified ceiling on fixed-term sentences set out in Rooke and D. (G. W.) applied equally to cases of cumulative sentencing where life imprisonment is not available as a penalty. Accordingly, the majority (Wood J.A. and Rowles J.A.) concluded that "the principle of totality" required the Court to reduce the respondent's sentence from 25 years to 18 years and 8 months' imprisonment, incorporating credit for time served prior to the imposition of sentence.

1. Reasons of Wood J.A.

25 While Wood J.A. agreed with the trial judge that the respondent ought to be sentenced to a "severe" punishment, Wood J.A. was not persuaded that the traditional objectives of sentencing would be better served in this instance through a sentence of 25 years relative to a sentence of 20 years. As he explained, at p. 116:

> The [respondent's] crimes against his children were such as to bring forth in all decent and right thinking people a natural desire to see the most severe form of punishment imposed upon him. But the law stands between the convicted felon and such natural emotions. The law requires a principled approach to sentencing, one that restrains the urge to punish by its adherence to definable and rational sentencing objectives, as well as by its acceptance of such guidance as Parliament has offered in the Criminal Code and in other statutes such as the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c. 20.
> I do not need to dwell at length on the proper objectives of sentencing which have been recognized and accepted many times in past decisions of this court. Suffice it to say that general deterrence, denunciation, and direct protection of the public through isolation, are all accepted objectives of punishment which in this case, whether considered individually or collectively, require that a long sentence of imprisonment be imposed on the [respondent]. What must be asked, however, is whether those objectives are significantly better served by a total sentence substantially in excess of twenty years than they would be by a sentence of twenty years. In my view, there is no reason to think that they would be. [Emphasis added.]

26 To illustrate his point, Wood J.A. proceeded to examine whether or not a marginal increase in sentence of five years beyond a sentence of twenty years would, in this instance, result in a significant advancement of the sentencing goals of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society. To begin, he argued that an increased sentence of 25 years imprisonment would not better promote the objectives of general and specific deterrence; relying on the empirical research he outlined in his concurring judgment in R. v. Sweeney (1992), 11 C.R. (4th) 1 (B.C. C.A.), Wood J.A. further argued that the incremental deterrent effect of an increased sentence drops off sharply past the 20-year mark. Wood J.A. also argued that the incremental returns to societal denunciation follow a similar path of diminishing returns. As he stated: "it does not seem realistic to assume that the measure of society's denunciation of this appellant's crimes would be lessened in any way by imposing a sentence of twenty years" (p. 116). On that point, he noted that denunciation ought to be distinguished from its "illegitimate retributive cousin", as "retribution is not a legitimate goal of sentencing", citing R. v. Hinch (1967), [1968] 3 C.C.C. 39 (B.C. C.A.).

27 Along the same theme, he argued that relative to a 20-year sentence, a 25-year sentence would not significantly advance the utilitarian goals of the protection of society and the rehabilitation of the offender given the present structure of the Criminal Code and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c. 20 (the "Corrections Act"). With respect to the former goal, Wood J.A. noted that under the combined parole eligibility provisions of both statutes, an increase in sentence to 25 years would not significantly extend the respondent's eligible date for parole. As he explained (at p. 117):

> As for the extra protection society receives from the imposition of an isolative sentence of twenty-five years, it must be noted that, in the absence of an order under s. 741.2 of the Criminal Code, and no such order was made in this case, the minimum eligibility date for a full parole in respect of all sentences, except those imposed for murder and treason, is the lesser of one third of the sentence imposed and seven years, calculated from the date of sentencing. Thus, if the prison system has the rehabilitative effect on the [respondent] which the trial judge apparently expects it to have, the increase in the isolative "value" of the sentence he imposed, compared with one of twenty years, is potentially limited to an additional four months of imprisonment, with the balance of the sentence served under parole. [Emphasis added.]

With respect to the latter goal, Wood J.A. concluded that in the absence of dangerous offender proceedings initiated by the Crown, the trial judge was not entitled to impose a lengthy term of sentence to reflect the respondent's resistance to rehabilitation. As he continued (at p. 117):

> [The trial judge] was apparently of the view that an additional five years of parole supervision would add substantially to the rehabilitative value of the sentence he imposed. With respect, the appellant was 52 years of age when sentenced. If there was any realistic possibility that he would not be fully rehabilitated by the time he finished serving his parole from a twenty-year sentence, the Crown had an obligation to bring dangerous offender proceedings against him. No such proceedings were brought. [Emphasis added.]

28 More fundamentally, in his examination of the parole eligibility scheme of the Corrections Act, Wood J.A. suggested that Parliament did not contemplate fixed-term sentences beyond 20 years under the Code. To begin, under s. 120(1) of the Corrections Act, as a default rule, any sentence beyond 20 years carries a fixed parole eligibility date of seven years. As such, Wood J.A. concluded that "at least for the purposes of parole eligibility, Parliament regards the numerical difference between a sentence of twenty-one years and anything in excess thereof, including life imprisonment, as largely irrelevant" (p. 118). Secondly, as a result of s. 120(2) of the Corrections Act, Wood J.A. noted that if the respondent could be sentenced to life imprisonment, he would be eligible for parole before the date he would be eligible for parole if he were sentenced to 21 years or more. Given the counter-intuitive implication that a person sentenced to life for a more serious offence would be eligible for parole before a person sentenced to 20 or more years for a less serious offence, Wood J.A. strongly intimated that Parliament did not intend for trial judges to impose numerical sentences beyond 20 years' imprisonment.

29 Accordingly, Wood J.A. held that the "proper approach to sentencing" in this case was established in Rooke and D. (G.W.). He rejected the trial judge's attempt to distinguish both cases, and concluded that the qualified ceiling on numerical sentences applied whether or not life imprisonment was available as a penalty. As he articulated the applicable legal principle of sentencing (at p. 119):

> ... in the absence of circumstances which direct that a specific term of imprisonment in excess of twenty years be imposed, the totality principle should be applied in a case such as this to restrain the imposition of punishment beyond that limit. That principle applies equally to cases involving convictions for offences which carry a maximum punishment of less than life imprisonment, as it does to those where life imprisonment is available. [Emphasis in original.]

2. Reasons of Rowles J.A.

30 Rowles J.A. concurred with the substance of the reasons of Wood J.A. However, she wrote separately to reiterate that the logic of Rooke and D. (G.W.) applied equally to circumstances involving cumulative sentences where life imprisonment was not available as a penalty. Furthermore, she stressed, at p. 125, that the trial judge made no particular finding that a sentence beyond 20 years was necessary to advance the core sentencing principle of "the protection of society". Rowles J.A. emphasized that lengthy sentences justified by reference to "the protection of society" should not be used "as an expedient alternative to dangerous offender proceedings which may be taken by the Crown under Pt. XXIV of the Criminal Code" (p. 125). On that point, it was hinted that the Crown should not be permitted to seek such a lengthy sentence in order to obviate the "procedural and substantive safeguards [of Pt. XXIV] which are not part of the usual sentencing process" (p. 125). Finally, she held that the facts of this case did not amount to sufficient "special circumstances" warranting a sentence beyond 20 years, hence distinguishing this case from R. v. D. (E.) (1992), 16 B.C.A.C. 193 (C.A.).

3. Reasons of Seaton J.A.

31 Seaton J.A. dissented from the reasons of Wood J.A. and Rowles J.A. He reviewed the reasons of Filmer Prov. Ct. J. in some detail, and expressed agreement with the sentencing judge that this case represents a "worst offence" involving a "worst offender". Accordingly, consistent with the framework set out in Rooke and D. (G.W.), Seaton J.A. was of the view that special circumstances were indeed present warranting a sentence in excess of 20 years. As such, Seaton J.A. was not persuaded that the respondent's sentence of 25 years ought to be reduced on appeal. However, he suggested that the sentence imposed by Filmer Prov. Ct. J. approached the legal ceiling of numerical sentences under the Criminal Code; as he stated: "I have no doubt that 25 years is at the outer edge of suitable sentences and would be available only where there was a number of worst offences by a worst offender" (p. 111).

IV. Grounds of Appeal

32 The Crown sought leave to appeal the Court of Appeal's reduction of sentence on the basis of the following grounds:

> 1. That the Court of Appeal for British Columbia erred in law in applying as a principle of sentencing that absent the imposition of a life sentence, the maximum sentence that may be imposed for any number of offences is 20 years.
>
> 2. That the Court of Appeal for British Columbia erred in law in finding that retribution is not a legitimate principle of sentencing.
>
> 3. That the Court of Appeal for British Columbia erred in law in finding that if the respondent would not be rehabilitated during a 20-year sentence the Crown was obligated to bring dangerous offender proceedings against him.
>
> 4. That the Court of Appeal for British Columbia erred in law in reducing the sentence from 25 years' imprisonment to 18 years and eight months' imprisonment.

V. Analysis

33 As a matter of established practice and sound policy, this Court rarely hears appeals relating to the fitness of individual sentences. As Dickson J. expressed in R. v. Gardiner, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 368, at p. 404:

> Although I am of the view that the Court has jurisdiction to assess the fitness, i.e. the quantum of a sentence, I am equally of the view that as a matter of policy we should not do so. It is a rule of our own making and a good rule.

Nonetheless, as part of its national duty as a general court of appeal for the better administration of the laws of Canada, this Court will entertain appeals involving the legal principles which ought to govern the pronouncement of sentence. See Gardiner, at p. 405; R. v. Chaisson, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1118, at p. 1123. Given that this appeal raises a number of important legal issues in relation to the general principles of criminal sentencing, we granted leave.

34 In my view, the most important issue posed by this appeal concerns whether the Court of Appeal erred in holding that there is a legal ceiling on fixed-term sentences under the Criminal Code, albeit qualified with an exception for special circumstances. Accordingly, I will address this issue first and in the most depth.

A. Did the Court of Appeal err in holding that there is a qualified ceiling on numerical sentences under the Code?

35 Before dealing with the crux of this issue, it would be instructive to survey both the general principles governing fixed-term sentences and parole eligibility under the Code and the Corrections Act, as well the evolution of the qualified legal ceiling developed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Rooke and D. (G.W.).

1. General Principles

36 For the multiplicity of offences against public order contained in the Criminal Code, the Code provides for a range of punishments including absolute and conditional discharges, probation orders, and fines. But by far the most common and recognized form of criminal sanction under our justice system is imprisonment. For offences where imprisonment is available, the Code sets maximum terms of incarceration in accordance with the relative severity of each crime. The current structure of the Code staggers maximum sentences for the full range of offences at numerical intervals of one year, two years, five years, ten years, and fourteen years, followed next by the most severe punishment under our general criminal law, life imprisonment. It has often been remarked that such maximum sentences ought to be reserved for the worst offender committing the worst type of offence. See R. c. Bédard (1989), 21 Q.A.C. 173 (C.A.), at p. 181; Ko v. R. (1978), *(*sub nom. R. v. Ko) 50 C.C.C. (2d) 430 (B.C. C.A.), at p. 436; R. v. Pruner (1979), 9 C.R. (3d) S-8 (Ont. C.A.), at p. S-11; C. Ruby, Sentencing (4th ed. 1994), at pp. 44-45; Canadian Sentencing Commission, Sentencing Reform: A Canadian Approach (1987), at p. 63. On the basis of this standard, the Commission noted that as a matter of judicial practice, the sentencing maxima of the Code for individual offences are rarely imposed by Canadian courts. For this and other reasons, the Commission commented that the structure of maximum penalties under the Code frequently provides little guidance to sentencing judges in imposing punishments in individual cases. See similarly, M.L. Friedland, "Controlling the Administrators of Justice" (1988-89) 31 Crim. L.Q. 280, at p. 311.

37 In some instances, the Code also sets mandatory minimum sentences for a number of offences. For instance, under s. 235, the mandatory minimum sentence for first and second degree murder is life imprisonment. In the past, however, this Court has viewed some such mandatory minimum sentences with constitutional suspicion in light of s. 12 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. See R. v. Smith, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1045. But within these two distant statutory poles, the Code delegates to trial judges considerable latitude in ordering an appropriate period of incarceration which advances the goals of sentencing and properly reflects the overall culpability of the offender. See s. 717(1), 717(2) of the Code.

38 The text of the Code, however, falls silent with regard to whether there is an upper limit on fixed-term or numerical terms of incarceration (i.e., non-life, quantitative terms of imprisonment). In a number of potential situations, a trial judge will be a position to impose a total fixed-term sentence beyond fourteen years, but life imprisonment will either be unavailable or inappropriate as a potential sentence. The first such instance will arise when an offender is convicted of a single count of an offence which carries a maximum punishment of life imprisonment, but the trial judge concludes that life imprisonment is not warranted on the facts. In such circumstances, the trial judge is presumably entitled to impose a sentence beyond 14 years, but the Code offers no guidance as to the upper range of fixed- term sentences which he or she may impose short of life imprisonment.

39 The second such instance arises when an offender is convicted of a number of distinct counts in relation to a single offence or in relation to a set of different offences. In such situations, s. 717(4)(c) of the Code empowers a trial judge to order that certain numerical sentences be served consecutively as opposed to concurrently. In the presence of such an order, an offender could quite easily be forced to serve a cumulative fixed-term sentence well beyond fourteen years, depending on the number of counts and the maximum sentence associated with each count. But once again, the Code falls silent as to whether or not there is an upper limit on cumulative sentences in our criminal law.

40 In both such circumstances, notwithstanding the lack of any explicit statutory ceiling on numerical sentences, Canadian courts have generally refrained from exploring whether there is indeed a limit on fixed-term sentences under the Code. Rather, guided by the legal obligation that a term of imprisonment be "just and appropriate" under the circumstances, courts have generally avoided imposing excessively harsh and onerous sentences which might test the potential legal ceilings governing the imposition of sentence. It is a well established tenet of our criminal law that the quantum of sentence imposed should be broadly commensurate with the gravity of the offence committed and the moral blameworthiness of the offender. As Wilson J. expressed in her concurring judgment in Reference re s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 533:

> It is basic to any theory of punishment that the sentence imposed bear some relationship to the offence; it must be a "fit" sentence proportionate to the seriousness of the offence. Only if this is so can the public be satisfied that the offender "deserved" the punishment he received and feel a confidence in the fairness and rationality of the system.

Cory J. similarly acknowledged the importance of "the principle of proportionality" in speaking for the Court in R. v. M. (J.J.), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 421, at p. 431, noting that "[i]t is true that for both adults and minors the sentence must be proportional to the offence committed". Indeed, the principle of proportionality in punishment is fundamentally connected to the general principle of criminal liability which holds that the criminal sanction may only be imposed on those actors who possess a morally culpable state of mind. In discussing the constitutional requirement of fault for murder in R. v. Martineau, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 633, at p. 645, I noted the related principle that "punishment must be proportionate to the moral blameworthiness of the offender", and that "those causing harm intentionally [should] be punished more severely than those causing harm unintentionally". On the principle of proportionality generally, see R. v. Wilmott (1966), [1967] 1 C.C.C. 171, at pp. 178-79 (Ont. C.A.); Sentencing Reform: A Canadian Approach, supra, at p. 154.

41 Within broader parameters, the principle of proportionality expresses itself as a constitutional obligation. As this Court has recognized on numerous occasions, a legislative or judicial sentence that is grossly disproportionate, in the sense that it is so excessive as to outrage standards of decency, will violate the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment under s. 12 of the Charter. See Smith, supra, at p. 1072; R. v. Luxton, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 711, at p. 724; R. v. Goltz, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 485, at pp. 498-99. However, as I noted in Smith, at p. 1072, "[w]e should be careful not to stigmatize every disproportionate or excessive sentence as being a constitutional violation", and thus the review of the proportionality of sentences should normally be left to the "usual sentencing appeal process" directed at the fitness of sentence.

42 In the context of consecutive sentences, this general principle of proportionality expresses itself through the more particular form of the "totality principle". The totality principle, in short, requires a sentencing judge who orders an offender to serve consecutive sentences for multiple offences to ensure that the cumulative sentence rendered does not exceed the overall culpability of the offender. As D. A. Thomas describes the principle in Principles of Sentencing (2nd ed. 1979), at p. 56:

> The effect of the totality principle is to require a sentencer who has passed a series of sentences, each properly calculated in relation to the offence for which it is imposed and each properly made consecutive in accordance with the principles governing consecutive sentences, to review the aggregate sentence and consider whether the aggregate sentence is "just and appropriate".

Clayton Ruby articulates the principle in the following terms in his treatise, Sentencing, supra, at pp. 44-45:

> The purpose is to ensure that a series of sentences, each properly imposed in relation to the offence to which it relates, is in aggregate "just and appropriate". A cumulative sentence may offend the totality principle if the aggregate sentence is substantially above the normal level of a sentence for the most serious of the individual offences involved, or if its effect is to impose on the offender "a crushing sentence" not in keeping with his record and prospects.

43 Whether under the rubric of the "totality principle" or a more generalized principle of proportionality, Canadian courts have been reluctant to impose single and consecutive fixed-term sentences beyond 20 years. See M. E. Rice, "Fixed-Term Sentences of More Than 20 Years Versus Life Imprisonment" (1994) 36 Crim. L. Q. 474, at p. 474, n. 1. As Rice has noted, as a matter of practice, provincial courts of appeal have only been willing to sustain sentences in excess of 20 years on rare occasions. See, e.g., R. v. Saumer, [1977] 3 W.W.R. 385 (B.C. C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 25 years for robbery); R. v. Nichols (1978), 9 A.R. 203 (C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 27 years for robbery); R. v. Belmas (1986), 27 C.C.C. (3d) 142 (B.C. C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 22 years for terrorist activities); R. v. Gorham (1987), 22 O.A.C. 237 (C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 23 years for robbery and firearms); R. v. Currie (1990), 98 N.S.R. (2d) 287 (C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 26 years for robbery and sexual assault); R. v. Yazdani, (sub nom. Yazdani c. R., [1992] R.J.Q. 2385 (C.A.) (cumulative sentence of 25 years for heroin importation). More commonly, sentences in excess of 20 years imposed at trial have been reduced to beneath 20 years on appeal, often through reference to the principle of totality. See, e.g., R. v. Velmurugu (1994), 74 O.A.C. 393 (C.A.); R. v. Parsons (1993), 24 C.R. (4th) 112 (Ont. C.A.); R. c. Pelletier (1989), 52 C.C.C. (3d) 340 (C.A. Qué.); R. c. Charest (1989), 30 Q.A.C. 227 (C.A.); R. v. Childs (1984), 52 N.B.R. (2d) 9 (C.A.).

44 In contrast to the absence of any explicit codal rules governing the limits on fixed-term sentences of imprisonment, the Criminal Code, read together with the Corrections Act, sets very clear rules governing the determination of parole eligibility. A person sentenced to a numerical term of imprisonment under the Code (i.e., not life) becomes eligible for full parole after serving the lesser of one third of the sentence or seven years. As s. 120(1) of the Corrections Act reads:

> 120. (1) Subject to sections 747 and 761 of the Criminal Code and to any order made under section 741.2 of that Act, the portion of a sentence of imprisonment that must be served before an offender may be released on full parole is the lesser of
> (a) one third of the sentence of imprisonment, and
>
> (b) seven years. [Emphasis added.]

The commencement date for the determination of parole eligibility has generally been understood to coincide with the commencement of sentence, namely the date when sentence is imposed. See s. 721(1) of the Code.

45 A person sentenced to life imprisonment other than as a minimum punishment (i.e., non-murder offences) becomes eligible for full parole after serving seven years. However, in contrast to a person sentenced to a numerical term of imprisonment, the calculation of parole eligibility for life imprisonment begins at an earlier date. Under s. 120(2) of the Corrections Act, the parole eligibility clock effectively begins to run from the date of arrest. The provision stipulates as follows:

> 120 (2) The portion of a sentence of imprisonment for life, imposed otherwise than as a minimum punishment, that must be served before an offender may be released on full parole is seven years less any time spent in custody between the day on which the offender was arrested and taken into custody, in respect of the offence for which the sentence was imposed, and the day on which the sentence was imposed. [Emphasis added.]

In the case of most violent offences short of first and second degree murder and most drug offences prosecuted by indictment, these default periods of parole ineligibility may be extended by the trial judge pursuant to an order under s. 741.2 of the Code. I note that these default rules of parole eligibility, specifically the seven-year limit on parole ineligibility, have been a feature of our correctional system for quite some time. See Parole Regulations, SOR/60-216, s. 2(1)(a), promulgated under the Parole Act, S.C. 1958, c. 38 (four years maximum); SOR/73-298, s. 1 (increasing the maximum to seven years).

46 It is against this backdrop of statutory provisions that the British Columbia Court of Appeal has developed its qualified judicial rule limiting fixed-term sentences of imprisonment.

2. The Jurisprudence

47 In response to the silence of the Criminal Code on maximum numerical sentences, through the course of a number of cases, the British Columbia Court of Appeal has fashioned a rule which limits fixed-term sentences to a period of 20 years, barring special circumstances warranting a more onerous term of imprisonment. In justifying this qualified rule, the Court of Appeal has placed considerable reliance upon inferences drawn from the mechanics of the parole eligibility provisions of the Code and Corrections Act. For a cogent summary of this line of judicial authority, see Rice, "Fixed-Term Sentences", supra.

48 The origin of this judicially created rule of sentencing appears to trace to Rooke, supra. In Rooke, the offender was convicted of conspiracy to traffic in cocaine, among other drug offences; the offence carried a maximum term of life imprisonment. The trial judge sentenced the offender to 25 years' imprisonment. On appeal, the Court of Appeal reduced the sentence to 20 years. In reducing the sentence, Lambert J.A., speaking for the majority, attached considerable weight to the language of McIntyre J.A. (as he then was) in R. v. Bell, B.C.C.A., Vancouver Registry CA771150, September 27, 1978. As Lambert J.A. responded to the Crown's request for a sentence beyond 20 years as follows:

> Most markedly, counsel for the Crown was not able to indicate any case where a sentence of less than life imprisonment was merited and the sentence imposed was nonetheless more than 20 years. That this seems to be the conclusion, namely, that the appropriate sentence for the worst offence committed by the worst offender is life imprisonment and the next step > down the scale is a sentence of 20 years imprisonment, is borne out by the reasons of Mr. Justice McIntyre in R. v. Bell .... Mr. Justice McIntyre was there giving the Judgment of the Court on a sentence appeal. He said:

>
> > "Life imprisonment is the maximum sentence that can be imposed for this offence. In my view, this offence, grave as it is, does not quite reach the maximum and does not call for the maximum punishment."
> > "Considering all the circumstances of this case, and particularly the reports from prison authorities, which the trial judge did not have before him and which we have had, and which are strongly in favour of the appellant, I would allow the appeal and substitute a sentence of 20 years' imprisonment."
> Mr. Justice McIntyre uses the phrase "this offence ... does not quite reach the maximum". It seems to me that Mr. Justice McIntyre is suggesting that there is no intervening step between 20 years imprisonment and life imprisonment, unless there are peculiar circumstances that would demand the insertion of such a step. [Emphasis added.]

Wood J.A., the author of the majority ruling of the Court of Appeal in this instance, concurred separately in Rooke. He would have preferred to leave the question of the ceiling open for another day, since, in his view, the issue was a "matter[] of some complexity upon which I would want the benefit of a full argument devoted to the rational underlying principles of sentencing."

49 Nearly a month later, the formative rule of Rooke was applied again in D. (G.W.), supra. In D. (G.W.), the offender was convicted of a number of sexual offences against young children, and was sentenced to a cumulative sentence of 25 years. On appeal, Lambert J.A., speaking for a unanimous court, reduced the sentence to 20 years. Lambert J.A. held that life imprisonment, the maximum available penalty, was not a fitting sentence in this instance. He thus turned to consider what an appropriate fixed-term sentence would be. In so doing, however, Lambert J.A. noted that if the offender had been sentenced to life, a more serious sentence, he would have been eligible for parole a full year earlier than if he had been sentenced to 25 years. As Lambert J.A. explained the apparent irony of the provisions:

> In this case a sentence of life imprisonment would, in some respects, be a better sentence from the point of view of the appellant than a sentence of 25 years, the sentence which was imposed. The reason is that the eligibility for parole in the case of a life sentence is calculated as seven years. Indeed, in every case the eligibility for parole arises on serving one-third of the sentence or seven years, whichever is less. But in the case of a life sentence, the sentence is considered to start running from when the imprisonment started before trial. That introduces a quirk to the sentencing principles in this case.
> In the case of a sentence of a fixed period, the sentence is considered to start running from the time when the sentence was imposed. Because the appellant spent more than a year in custody the effect would be that he would have eligibility for parole, in this case, a year at least earlier if he received a life sentence than he would on the basis of a sentence of 25 years. [Emphasis added.]

In light of this "quirk" of the parole eligibility rules, Lambert J.A. concluded that the rule in Rooke ought to be followed.

50 The qualified ceiling set out in Rooke and D. (G.W.) has been reaffirmed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, and has since been followed by other provincial courts of appeal. In D. (E.), supra, a unanimous bench of the court endorsed the rulings of both cases, and expressed the sentencing rule in the following terms, at pp. 203-4:

> It is recognized that apart from a sentence of life imprisonment, in the absence of special circumstances the totality principle operates to curtail a single sentence, or a number of consecutive sentences, to a total of 20 years.

The qualified ceiling ruling has also been adopted by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in R. v. J. (J.T.) (1991), 73 Man. R. (2d) 103 (C.A.). In J. (J.T.), after a number of trials, the offender was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to 22 years' imprisonment. The offender appealed the sentence, relying in part on the jurisprudence of the B.C. Court of Appeal in Rooke and D. (G. W.). Twaddle J.A., speaking for the court, agreed that fixed-term sentences ought to be generally limited to 20 years, with the next sentencing step being life imprisonment. In so holding, Twaddle J.A. attached similar importance to the operation of the parole eligibility provisions, at p. 107:

> As Lambert J.A. pointed out in R. v. Danchella, supra, the Parole Regulations provide that a prisoner becomes eligible for parole no matter how long his sentence, it not being for murder or high treason, after he has served seven years. The only purpose, therefore, of imposing a fixed term in excess of 20 years is to ensure that the offender may be detained for a longer time if the Parole Board is of the view at the end of 20 years that the offender's release would still constitute an undue risk to society. But, if a judge thinks it is necessary to authorize detention for more than 20 years, surely the next step is life. At that point, the additional period of detention required is speculative. No judge can safely foresee how much longer is required.

But in contrast to the previous cases, instead of reducing the offender's sentence from 22 years to 20 years, Twaddle J.A. concluded that in light of the gravity of the offender's crimes, his sentence ought to be increased to life. See also R. v. Nienhuis (1991), 117 A.R. 253 (C.A.), and R. v. Dipietro (1991), 120 A.R. 102 (C.A.), where the Alberta Court of Appeal increased an offender's sentence from 23 1/2 years and 22 years respectively to life imprisonment, although in neither case did the court base its ruling on the operation of the parole eligibility provisions.

51 More recently, however, the B.C. Court of Appeal has emphasized the qualified nature of its rule. More specifically, in two cases since Rooke and D. (G. W.), the Court has found special circumstances warranting the imposition of a sentence beyond 20 years. In D. (E.), supra, the court sustained a cumulative sentence of 23 years for numerous offences against women and children. Speaking for the court, Hinds J.A. endorsed the case law of Rooke and D. (G. W.), but noted, at p. 204, that "there are cases where in special circumstances sentences totalling more than 20 years have been approved or given by this Court". In light of the "extremely serious circumstances of the offences" and "the danger of [the offender] repeating his transgressions against women and children", he concluded that special circumstances were present justifying a lengthy sentence beyond the qualified legal ceiling. Similarly, in R. v. Caissie (1993), 24 B.C.A.C. 57 (C.A.), the court upheld a cumulative sentence of 22 years for sexual assault and robbery. Although life imprisonment was available for the robbery conviction, Hinds J.A. declined to impose the maximum penalty since the offender did not represent a "worst offender". Nonetheless, Hinds J.A. held that the offender's propensity for violence and his dim prospects for rehabilitation justified a cumulative sentence beyond 20 years. As he held, at p. 65: "In the special circumstances of this case the totality principle of sentencing is not offended."

52 Finally, it is appropriate to note that the judicial consensus on the qualified ceiling rule has not been unanimous. Following the majority decision of Wood J.A. in the Court of Appeal below, the Ontario Court of Appeal had the opportunity to consider the wisdom of the Rooke and D. (G.M.) jurisprudence in R. v. C. (J.A.) (1995), 86 O.A.C. 135. The offender in C. (J.A.) was found guilty by a jury of a pattern of physical and sexual abuse against his stepchildren which has disturbing parallels with the pattern of abuse inflicted by the respondent. The trial judge, finding that the case represented "one of the worst offences involving the worst offender" (p. 141), sentenced the offender to 30 years' imprisonment through consecutive sentences. On appeal of sentence, the Court acknowledged the majority ruling of the B.C. Court of Appeal in this case, but declined to adopt the qualified ceiling rule. As the court stated (at p. 142): "we would respectfully disagree with Wood J.A. in the R. v. C.A.M. case that there should be some cap or limit to the sentences for these serious cases". Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal concluded that the 30-year sentence was excessive and reduced the offender's sentence to 21 years.

3. The Argument for a Qualified Ceiling on Fixed-Term Sentences

53 The core issue in this appeal concerns whether or not Parliament intended fixed-term sentences under the Code to generally be limited to 20 years' imprisonment, whether as a sentence for a single offence where life imprisonment is available but unwarranted, or as a sentence for multiple offences involving consecutive terms of imprisonment. If I have understood the jurisprudence of the British Columbia and Manitoba Courts of Appeal correctly, the principal arguments in support of such an intent to limit the otherwise broad sentencing discretion of trial judges are based on inferences drawn from the operation of the parole eligibility provisions contained within both the Code and the Corrections Act.

54 The central argument advanced by the proponents of such a ceiling is that Parliament, by fixing the default parole ineligibility period for any numerical sentence beyond 20 years (absent an order under s. 741.2) at seven years, implicitly intended to cap numerical sentences at 20 years. Given the fact that an offender sentenced to 30 or 40 years is still eligible for full parole at seven years, the suggestion is that Parliament saw little utility in such lengthy terms of imprisonment. As Wood J.A.

argued at the Court of Appeal, "at least for the purposes of parole eligibility, Parliament regards the numerical difference between a sentence of twenty-one years and anything in excess thereof, including life imprisonment, as largely irrelevant" (p. 118).

55 As a related argument, the same proponents point to an apparently absurd consequence which would result if fixed-term sentences beyond 20 years were permitted under the Code. When one compares the parole eligibility rules governing life imprisonment to the analogous rules governing numerical sentences, it is clear that an offender sentenced to life is eligible for parole before an offender sentenced to a numerical term beyond 20 years. Given the apparently absurd result that an offender sentenced for a more serious offence is eligible for parole before an offender sentenced for a less serious offence or set of offences, the suggestion advanced is that Parliament must have intended to preclude numerical sentences beyond 20 years.

56 With the greatest respect, I find no evidence in either the Code or the Corrections Act that Parliament intended to constrain a trial judge's traditionally broad sentencing discretion through the imposition of a qualified legal ceiling on numerical sentences pegged at 20 years' imprisonment. Rather, in my reading of both statutes, beyond setting statutory maximum and minimum sentences which reflect the relative severity of different offences, Parliament intended to vest trial judges with a wide ambit of authority to impose a sentence which is "just and appropriate" under the circumstances and which adequately advances the core sentencing objectives of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society. Accordingly, in my view, whether or not life imprisonment is available as a maximum sentence in the particular case, there is no pre-set ceiling on fixed-term sentences under the Code.

57 Given the nature of the parole regime, there are limited, if any, inferences that one can draw concerning the structure of maximum sentences under the Code from the operation of the parole eligibility provisions of the Corrections Act. As I shall endeavour to demonstrate, Parliament established the parole system as a regime by which the conditions of incarceration of a sentence could be altered by subsequent executive review, rather than as a regime by which the sentence itself could be reduced. In my view, the fact that conditions of incarceration are subject to review and possible change at a particular point in time says little about the efficacy and limits of a global fixed-term sentence in advancing the traditional goals of sentencing. Put differently, there is no indication that the parole ineligibility rules of the Corrections Act were intended to constrain a court's ability to advance the goals of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society through numerical sentences beyond 20 years. Indeed, the Corrections Act was enacted to establish an administrative regime for executing and implementing the scheme of discretionary punishments anticipated by its legislative parent, the Criminal Code. To suggest that the mechanical parole rules contained within the Corrections Act have the contrary effect of dramatically restricting the sentencing discretion of trial judges under the Code, with respect, fundamentally misreads the relationship between the two statutes.

4. The Nature of the Parole System

58 The origins of our modern parole system date from the early part of this century. Prior to Confederation, a sentence imposed at trial could be commuted to "banishment" or "transportation" (i.e., forced removal to another colony), or could be reduced through an exercise of the Royal prerogative of mercy. But apart from these exceptional means, the laws of Canada provided no general mechanism for the administrative modification or suspension of a judicial sentence. See, generally, D. P. Cole and A. Manson, Release from Imprisonment (1990), at pp. 159-63. The earliest legislative scheme resembling parole appears to date from The Penitentiary Act of 1868, S.C. 1868, c. 75, which provided for a simple mechanism for sentence remission. However, the first contemporary regime for conditional release was established at the end of the 19th century with the "Ticket of Leave Act", An Act to provide for the Conditional Liberation of Penitentiary Convicts, S.C. 1899, c. 49. Under that statute, a convict could apply to executive authorities for early release, subject to a variety of conditions of supervision, prior to the expiration of his sentence. See Cole & Manson, supra, at pp. 164-167. As M. Campbell and D.P. Cole point out, "Conditional Release Considerations in Sentencing" (1985), 42 C.R. (3d) 191, at p. 203, n. 14, the "Ticket of Leave Act" was generally viewed as a mechanism which codified and regularized the exercise of the Crown's prerogative of clemency. Accordingly, applications under the Act were understood as a mechanism for the reduction of sentence.

59 However, with the publication of the "Fauteux Report", Report of a Committee Appointed to Inquire into the Principles and Procedures followed in the Remission Service of the Department of Justice (1956), and the ensuing passage of the first modern Canadian Parole Act (An Act to provide for the Conditional Liberation of Persons Undergoing Sentences of Imprisonment),

S.C. 1958, c. 38, the parole system was transformed into a regime by which executive authorities were vested with authority to review and alter the conditions under which imprisonment is served. Under s. 11(1) of that Act, the judicially imposed sentence of a paroled inmate was "deemed to continue in force" until the expiry of the term of imprisonment (emphasis added). Similarly, under s. 2(d), parole was defined as "authority granted under this Act to an inmate to be at large during his term of imprisonment" (emphasis added). Under that Act and its subsequent incarnations, administrative parole authorities enjoyed no authority to reduce a sentence by altering the expiry date of the warrant of committal, i.e. the formal judicial order imposing sentence. See Parole Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-2, as amended by S.C. 1976-77, c. 53. See also Campbell and Cole, supra, at p. 203. As McLennan J.A. described the legal premise of the modern parole system in Wilmott, supra, at pp. 181-82.

> It is to be emphasized that the effect of a grant of parole is not to alter the length of a sentence imposed by a Court upon an offender. Parole provides that the offender serves his sentence outside the prison, not as a free man, but under supervision and subject to terms and conditions imposed. A person on parole is not a free man. The grant may be revoked in the discretion of the Board and the offender is thereupon recommitted to serve the portion of the original term of imprisonment that remains unexpired at the date parole was granted. ...
> A grant of parole does not reduce a sentence. The Board has power in appropriate cases only to change the place where it is served. [Emphasis added.]

60 The essential nature of the parole system remained unchanged with the legislative modernization of the Parole Act in 1992. Section 99(1) of the Corrections Act continues to define "full parole" as the authority to grant an offender the right "to be at large during the offender's term of imprisonment" (emphasis added). As well, s. 128(1) reiterates that "[a]n offender who is released on parole, statutory release or unescorted temporary absence continues, while entitled to be at large, to serve the sentence of imprisonment until its expiration according to law" (emphasis added).

61 Furthermore, as Campbell and Cole underscore, supra, at pp. 204-5, the realities of the conditional release system reinforce the argument that parole is an alteration of the conditions of sentence, rather than a reduction of sentence. Under the Corrections Act and its attendant regulations, an offender on parole is subject to strict limits on his or her freedom. While an offender on conditional release is no longer physically confined, a parolee is subject to mandatory parole conditions set out under the Corrections and Conditional Release Regulations, SOR/92-620 (October 29, 1992). For instance, a parolee must remain at all times within a fixed area designated by the parole supervisor, must report to the police as instructed by the supervisor, and must advise the supervisor of any change in his or her residential, financial, or occupational status. See Regulations, s. 161(1). Additionally, under the Corrections Act, a parolee is subject to any additional restrictions that the National Parole Board deems "reasonable and necessary" in order "to protect society." A parolee may also be ordered to reside in a community-based residential facility. The Parole Board may suspend parole in response to a breach of these conditions, or if at any time it is "necessary and reasonable" to prevent such a breach or to protect society. See ss. 133(3) and (4) and 135(1) of the Corrections Act.

62 In short, the history, structure and existing practice of the conditional release system collectively indicate that a grant of parole represents a change in the conditions under which a judicial sentence must be served, rather than a reduction of the judicial sentence itself. Needless to say, an offender enjoys a greater measure of freedom and liberty when the conditions of his or her imprisonment are changed from physical confinement to full parole. Indeed, as we implicitly held in R. v. Gamble, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595, at pp. 609, 647, continued incarceration with an extended period of parole ineligibility (much less continued incarceration through an actual denial of parole) may constitute a deprivation of a cognizable liberty interest under s. 7 of the Charter. But even though the conditions of incarceration are subject to change through a grant of parole to the offender's benefit, the offender's sentence continues in full effect. The offender remains under they strict control of the parole system, and the offender's liberty remains significantly curtailed for the full duration of the offender's numerical or life sentence. The deterrent and denunciatory purposes which animated the original sentence remain in force, notwithstanding the fact that the conditions of sentence have been modified. The goal of specific deterrence is still advanced, since the offender remains supervised to the extent and degree necessary to prevent possible crime, and since the offender remains under the shadow of re-incarceration if he or she commits another crime. As well, the goal of denunciation continues to operate, as the offender still carries the societal stigma of being a convicted offender who is serving a criminal sentence.

5. The Effect of the Parole Eligibility Rules

63 Against this backdrop, the purpose and effect of the parole eligibility rules in the Corrections Act become clear. Within the broad statutory minimum and maximum sentences of the Code, Parliament has vested trial judges with considerable discretion to direct a just and appropriate sentence which advanced the principles of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and protection of society among other sentencing goals. But in addition to providing for the imposition of a global sentence which reflects the culpability of the offender, Parliament also established threshold periods of parole ineligibility, because it concluded that the traditional blend of sentencing principles also required that a minimum portion of the global sentence be served through conditions of physical confinement. As Iacobucci J. recently noted in R. v. Shropshire, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 227, at para. 23, in discussing the mandatory minimum period of parole ineligibility for first degree murder: "parole ineligibility is part of the "punishment" and thereby forms an important element of sentencing policy".

64 While Parliament was undoubtedly animated by the full range of sentencing principles in setting such threshold periods, it appears to have been principally motivated by the sentencing goals of deterrence and denunciation. By establishing a fixed formula for a minimum period of parole ineligibility under s. 120(1) of the Corrections Act (i.e., the lesser of 1/3 of the sentence or seven years), Parliament seems to have concluded that a minimum period of physical confinement was necessary to advance the causes of general deterrence and denunciation even if the offender was completely rehabilitated and posed absolutely no threat to society at the time of sentence. Courts of appeal have similarly concluded that other minimum parole ineligibility periods set by the Code are principally motivated by the concerns of deterrence and denunciation. As the Manitoba Court of Appeal concluded in R. v. Ly (1992), 72 C.C.C. (3d) 57, at p. 61, in discussing the 10-year parole ineligibility for second-degree murder under s. 744 of the Code: "Parliament's purpose in adding a minimum period of parole ineligibility to a life sentence was, in my view, twofold. It was to deter and denounce the crime."

65 But I find no necessary inference from this larger scheme of parole eligibility rules governing review of the conditions of sentence that Parliament intended to cap the quantum of sentence available under the Code. Under s. 120(1) of the Corrections Act, Parliament quite clearly fixed the default parole ineligibility period for any numerical sentence beyond 20 years at seven years. As I understand the purpose of the seven-year rule, Parliament apparently concluded that the principles of deterrence and denunciation only required that an offender spend seven years under the conditions of physical confinement. But there is no indication that the default parole ineligibility rules exhaust a court's ability to advance the goals of deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society through the imposition of a numerical sentence beyond 20 years. Even though the conditions of the offender's term of imprisonment may be subject to change after seven years, the interaction of well-accepted sentencing principles could still require that the offender remain under the supervisory aegis of the parole system (if not under imprisonment) for well beyond twenty years. In short, I am not persuaded that the parole eligibility rules necessarily undermine a trial judge's ability to advance the goals of sentencing through a fixed-term sentence beyond 20 years. As such, there is no necessary inference that Parliament implicitly imposed a qualified cap on fixed-term sentences through its adoption of the Corrections Act and its predecessors.

66 The argument advanced by the B.C. Court of Appeal in favour of a sentence ceiling suffers from other logical flaws. On the basis of the seven-year rule contained within s. 120(1) of the Corrections Act, Wood J.A. submits that Parliament attached little practical utility to terms of imprisonment which exceed 20 years. But with respect, if that was the case, it seems odd that Parliament would nonetheless have explicitly provided for life imprisonment as a potential sentence, since a life sentence will often exceed 20 years in effect. Furthermore, even if one can finesse that logical difficulty, there is no reasonable basis for inferring from s. 120(1) that Parliament intended a qualified ceiling on fixed-term sentences, which permits sentences beyond 20 years in the presence of vaguely defined "special circumstances".

67 In addition to the foregoing arguments in support of a legal ceiling on numerical sentences, the B.C. Court of Appeal attached some weight to an apparent absurdity in the mechanics of the parole eligibility rules. Interpreting the provisions of the Corrections Act according to their plain meaning, as a default rule, an offender sentenced to life imprisonment would be eligible for parole before an offender sentenced to a numerical sentence beyond 20 years. At face value, the operation of the parole ineligibility rules seems counter-intuitive; one would normally think that an offender sentenced to a more serious crime where life imprisonment was available would be eligible for parole after an offender sentenced to a lesser crime. As such, the suggestion is that Parliament must have intended to avoid such an absurdity, and that the courts ought to prevent such an absurdity through the imposition of a cap on fixed-term sentences.

68 Quite frankly, I fail to see any obvious absurdity on the face of the parole eligibility scheme. Upon close examination, one can readily infer an intelligible legislative intent behind the operation of the rules. Parliament could have concluded that as a result of the unique life-long parole restrictions associated with a term of life imprisonment, an offender sentenced to life ought to be entitled to have his or her pre-trial custody credited to his or her parole ineligibility time.

69 Furthermore, any alleged absurdity on the face of the statute will rarely manifest itself in the actual release dates of prisoners. The rules of the Corrections Act only govern an offender's eligibility for full parole; the actual granting of full parole remains within the discretion of the National Parole Board. If an offender has committed a severe enough offence to warrant a life sentence, the offender will, ceteris paribus, represent a greater threat to society than an offender who received a non-life sentence. As such, notwithstanding the operation of the parole eligibility rules, I am inclined to believe that the Parole Board will ordinarily conclude that the protection of society requires an offender sentenced to life imprisonment to remain under conditions of physical incarceration longer than an offender serving a fixed-term sentence of imprisonment. Accordingly, in the actual operation of these rules, it will simply not be the normal practice that an offender sentenced to life will receive conditional release before an offender sentenced to a fixed-term sentence beyond 20 years.

70 Finally, even if one assumes that the parole eligibility rules result in an absurdity, I believe that such a legislative absurdity would only be compounded rather than corrected by imposing a strict restriction on the sentencing discretion of trial judges under the Criminal Code. The Corrections Act was enacted for the purpose of creating a comprehensive correctional system to execute the larger system of criminal sentencing established by the Code. As the Corrections Act defines its own purpose:

> 3. The purpose of the federal correctional system is to contribute to the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society by
> (a) carrying out sentences imposed by courts through the safe and humane custody and supervision of offenders .... [Emphasis added.]

In my view, it would seriously pervert both the very purpose and function of the statute to suggest that the peculiarities of the parole eligibility rules contained within the Corrections Act ought to dictate and control the structure of sentences under the Code. The Corrections Act was intended to facilitate the sentencing discretion of trial judges rather than frustrate it. As such, I simply cannot accept that we should modify the basic architecture of our criminal justice system to avoid a potential anomaly arising from the comparative rules governing the commencement of parole eligibility under ss. 120(1) and 120(2) of the Corrections Act.

6. Conclusion

71 In summary, I find no evidence from the parole eligibility rules under the Corrections Act that Parliament intended to impose a qualified ceiling on numerical sentences under the Code. A numerical sentence beyond 20 years may still significantly advance the traditional continuum of sentencing goals ranging from deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation to the protection of society, notwithstanding the fact that an offender is eligible for review of the conditions of his or her incarceration after seven years (absent an order extending the period of ineligibility under s. 741.2 of the Code). Accordingly, I remain thoroughly unpersuaded that Parliament intended to preclude such numerical sentences through the adoption of the Corrections Act and its legislative predecessors. The very purpose of the Corrections Act was to enable a trial judge's sentencing discretion under the Code rather than to hobble it. In the absence of a clearer expression of legislative intent on such an important subject implicating the basic structure of our criminal justice system, I decline to read such a dramatic restriction on the sentencing discretion of judges into the Criminal Code.

72 In my view, within the broad statutory maximum and minimum penalties defined for particular offences under the Code, trial judges enjoy a wide ambit of discretion under s. 717 in selecting a "just and appropriate" fixed-term sentence which adequately promotes the traditional goals of sentencing, subject only to the fundamental principle that the global sentence imposed reflect the overall culpability of the offender and the circumstances of the offence. As such, I decline to delineate any pre-fixed outer boundary to the sentencing discretion of a trial judge, whether at 20 years, or even at 25 years as suggested by Seaton J.A. in dissent at the Court of Appeal. Similarly, I see no reason why numerical sentences in Canada ought to be de facto limited at 20 years as a matter of judicial habit or convention. Whether a fixed-term sentence beyond 20 years is imposed as a sentence for a single offence where life imprisonment is available but not imposed, or as a cumulative sentence for multiple offences where life imprisonment is not available, there is no a priori ceiling on fixed-term sentences under the Code.

73 The bastion which protects Canadians from unduly harsh fixed-term sentences is not found in the mechanics of the Corrections Act but rather in the good sense of our nation's trial judges. For many of the lesser crimes presently before our courts, a single or cumulative sentence beyond 20 years would undoubtedly be grossly excessive, and probably cruel and unusual. In other circumstances, such a stern sentence would be both fitting and appropriate. In our system of justice, the ultimate protection against excessive criminal punishment lies within a sentencing judge's overriding duty to fashion a "just and appropriate" punishment which is proportional to the overall culpability of the offender.

74 However, in the process of determining a just and appropriate fixed-term sentence of imprisonment, the sentencing judge should be mindful of the age of the offender in applying the relevant principles of sentencing. After a certain point, the utilitarian and normative goals of sentencing will eventually begin to exhaust themselves once a contemplated sentence starts to surpass any reasonable estimation of the offender's remaining natural life span. Accordingly, in exercising his or her specialized discretion under the Code, a sentencing judge should generally refrain from imposing a fixed-term sentence which so greatly exceeds an offender's expected remaining life span that the traditional goals of sentencing, even general deterrence and denunciation, have all but depleted their functional value. But with that consideration in mind, the governing principle remains the same: Canadian courts enjoy a broad discretion in imposing numerical sentences for single or multiple offences, subject only to the broad statutory parameters of the Code and the fundamental principle of our criminal law that global sentences be "just and appropriate".

75 Pursuant to the foregoing discussion, I conclude that the British Columbia Court of Appeal erred in applying as a principle of sentencing that fixed-term sentences under the Criminal Code ought to be capped at 20 years, absent special circumstances. However, the Court of Appeal also justified its reduction of the respondent's sentence on the grounds that the sentence imposed by Filmer Prov. Ct. J. was unfit under the particular circumstances. Accordingly, it is still necessary to examine whether the Court of Appeal erred in law in its review of the fitness of the respondent's sentence. But before turning to that question, I intend to deal briefly with the Crown's two remaining grounds of appeal.

B. Did the Court of Appeal err in holding that retribution is not a legitimate principle of sentencing?

76 As a second and independent ground of appeal, the Crown argues that the Court of Appeal erred in law by relying on the proposition that "retribution is not a legitimate goal of sentencing" (p. 116) in reducing the sentence imposed by Filmer Prov. Ct. J. to 18 years and 8 months. In my reading of the judgment of the Court of Appeal below, I find little evidence that the passing remarks of Wood J.A. in relation to the legitimacy of retribution played a significant role in his conclusion that the respondent's sentence ought to be reduced to 18 years and 8 months' imprisonment. It should be noted that Rowles J.A., in her concurring reasons, did not even discuss retribution as a principle of sentencing. Similarly, there is no evidence that Filmer Prov. Ct. J. placed any explicit reliance on the objective of "retribution" in initially rendering his stern sentence. Accordingly, whether or not Wood J.A. erred as a strict matter of law in his discussion of the philosophical merits of retribution as a principle of sentencing, I conclude that Wood J.A.'s discussion of retribution was not a decisive element in the majority of the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the sentence of the respondent ought to be reduced to below 19 years. Therefore, I am persuaded that the remarks of Wood J.A. in relation to retribution did not constitute a reversible error. However, given the continued judicial debate over this issue, particularly in recent judgments of the B.C. Court of Appeal (see, e.g., R. v. Hicks (1995), 56 B.C.A.C. 259, at para. 14 (rejecting retribution), R. v. Eneas, [1994] B.C.J. No. 262, at paras. 45 and 46 (endorsing retribution); R. v. M. (D.E.S.) (1993), 80 C.C.C. (3d) 371, at p. 376 (rejecting retribution); R. v. Hoyt, [1992] B.C.J. No. 2315 [reported at 17 C.R. (4th) 338], at paras. 21 and 22 (rejecting retribution); R. v. Pettigrew (1990), 56 C.C.C. (3d) 390, at pp. 394-95 (endorsing retribution)), it would be prudent for this Court to clarify briefly the existing state of Canadian law in this important area.

77 It has been recognized by this Court that retribution is an accepted, and indeed important, principle of sentencing in our criminal law. As La Forest J. acknowledged in discussing the constitutionality of the dangerous offender provisions of the Criminal Code in R. v. L. (T.P.), (sub nom. R. v. L.) [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309, at p. 329:

> In a rational system of sentencing, the respective importance of prevention, deterrence, retribution and rehabilitation will vary according to the nature of the crime and the circumstances of the offender. No one would suggest that any of these functional considerations should be excluded from the legitimate purview of legislative or judicial decisions regarding sentencing. [Emphasis added.]

This Court has since re-endorsed this passage on a number of occasions as a proper articulation of some of the guiding principles of sentencing in a number of subsequent cases. See Luxton, supra, at p. 721; Goltz, supra, at p. 503; and Shropshire, supra, at para. 23.

78 The Canadian Sentencing Commission in its 1987 Report on Sentencing Reform also endorsed retribution as a legitimate and relevant consideration in the sentencing process. While the Commission noted that strict retributivist theory on its own fails to provide a general justification for the imposition of criminal sanctions, the Commission argued that retribution, in conjunction with other utilitarian justifications of punishment (i.e., deterrence and rehabilitation), contributes to a more coherent theory of punishment (supra, at pp. 141-42, 143-45). More specifically, the Commission argued that a theory of retribution centred on "just deserts" or "just sanctions" provides a helpful organizing principle for the imposition of criminal sanctions (at p. 143). Indeed, as the Commission noted, retribution frequently operates as a principle of restraint, as utilitarian principles alone may direct individualized punishments which unfairly exceed the culpability of the offender. As the Report stated at pp. 133-34:

> The ethical foundation of retributivism lies in the following principle: it is immoral to treat one person as a resource for others. From this principle it follows that the only legitimate ground for punishing a person is the blameworthiness of his or her conduct. It also follows that sanctions must be strictly proportionate to the culpability of a person and to the seriousness of the offence for which that person has been convicted. ... According to these principles, all exemplary sentences (i.e. the imposition of a harsher sanction on an individual offender so that he or she may be made an example to the community) are unjustified, because they imply that an offender's plight may be used as a means or as a resource to deter potential offenders.

See, similarly, B. P. Archibald, Crime and Punishment: The Constitutional Requirements for Sentencing Reform in Canada (August 1988), at p. 18. With these considerations in mind, the Commission explicitly defined the fundamental purpose of sentencing with reference to the normative goal of imposing "just sanctions". As the Commission cast the guiding purpose of criminal sentencing, at p. 153:

> In furtherance of the overall purpose of the criminal law of maintaining a just, peaceful and safe society, the fundamental purpose of sentencing is to preserve the authority of and promote respect for the law through the imposition of just sanctions. [Emphasis added.]

A majority of this Court has since expressed approval of this passage as an accurate statement of the essential goals of sentencing. See R. v. Jones, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 229, at p. 291 (although I dissented on the merits of the case).

79 Retribution, as an objective of sentencing, represents nothing less than the hallowed principle that criminal punishment, in addition to advancing utilitarian considerations related to deterrence and rehabilitation, should also be imposed to sanction the moral culpability of the offender. In my view, retribution is integrally woven into the existing principles of sentencing in Canadian law through the fundamental requirement that a sentence imposed be "just and appropriate" under the circumstances. Indeed, it is my profound belief that retribution represents an important unifying principle of our penal law by offering an essential conceptual link between the attribution of criminal liability and the imposition of criminal sanctions. With regard to the attribution of criminal liability, I have repeatedly held that it is a principle of "fundamental justice" under s. 7 of the Charter that criminal liability may only be imposed if an accused possesses a minimum "culpable mental state" in respect of the ingredients of the alleged offence. See R. v. Martineau, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 633, at p. 645. See, similarly, Motor Vehicle Act (British Columbia), supra; R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636. It is this mental state which gives rise to the "moral blameworthiness" which justifies the state in imposing the stigma and punishment associated with a criminal sentence. See Martineau, at p. 646. I submit that it is this same element of "moral blameworthiness" which animates the determination of the appropriate quantum of punishment for a convicted offender as a "just sanction." As I noted in Martineau in discussing the sentencing scheme for manslaughter under the Code, it is a recognized principle of our justice system that "punishment be meted out with regard to the level of moral blameworthiness of the offender" (p. 647). See the similar observations of W. E. B. Code in "Proportionate Blameworthiness and the Rule against Constructive Sentencing" (1992), 11 C.R. (4th) 40, at pp. 41-42.

80 However, the meaning of retribution is deserving of some clarification. The legitimacy of retribution as a principle of sentencing has often been questioned as a result of its unfortunate association with "vengeance" in common parlance. See, e.g., R. v. Hinch, supra, at pp. 43-44; R. v. Calder (1956), 114 C.C.C. 155 (Man. C.A.), at p. 161. But it should be clear from my foregoing discussion that retribution bears little relation to vengeance, and I attribute much of the criticism of retribution as a principle to this confusion. As both academic and judicial commentators have noted, vengeance has no role to play in a civilized system of sentencing. See Ruby, Sentencing, supra, at p. 13. Vengeance, as I understand it, represents an uncalibrated act of harm upon another, frequently motivated by emotion and anger, as a reprisal for harm inflicted upon oneself by that person. Retribution in a criminal context, by contrast, represents an objective, reasoned and measured determination of an appropriate punishment which properly reflects the moral culpability of the offender, having regard to the intentional risk-taking of the offender, the consequential harm caused by the offender, and the normative character of the offender's conduct. Furthermore, unlike vengeance, retribution incorporates a principle of restraint; retribution requires the imposition of a just and appropriate punishment, and nothing more. As R. Cross has noted in The English Sentencing System (2nd ed. 1975), at p. 121: "The retributivist insists that the punishment must not be disproportionate to the offender's deserts."

81 Retribution, as well, should be conceptually distinguished from its legitimate sibling, denunciation. Retribution requires that a judicial sentence properly reflect the moral blameworthiness of that particular offender. The objective of denunciation mandates that a sentence should also communicate society's condemnation of that particular offender's conduct. In short, a sentence with a denunciatory element represents a symbolic, collective statement that the offender's conduct should be punished for encroaching on our society's basic code of values as enshrined within our substantive criminal law. As Lord Justice Lawton stated in R. v. Sargeant (1974), 60 Cr. App. Rep. 74 (C.A.), at p. 77: "society, through the courts, must show its abhorrence of particular types of crime, and the only way in which the courts can show this is by the sentences they pass." The relevance of both retribution and denunciation as goals of sentencing underscores that our criminal justice system is not simply a vast system of negative penalties designed to prevent objectively harmful conduct by increasing the cost the offender must bear in committing an enumerated offence. Our criminal law is also a system of values. A sentence which expresses denunciation is simply the means by which these values are communicated. In short, in addition to attaching negative consequences to undesirable behaviour, judicial sentences should also be imposed in a manner which positively instills the basic set of communal values shared by all Canadians as expressed by the Criminal Code.

82 As a closing note to this discussion, it is important to stress that neither retribution nor denunciation alone provides an exhaustive justification for the imposition of criminal sanctions. Rather, in our system of justice, normative and utilitarian considerations operate in conjunction with one another to provide a coherent justification for criminal punishment. As Gonthier J. emphasized in Goltz, supra, at p. 502, the goals of the penal sanction are both "broad and varied". Accordingly, the meaning of retribution must be considered in conjunction with the other legitimate objectives of sentencing, which include (but are not limited to) deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and the protection of society. Indeed, it is difficult to perfectly separate these inter-related principles. And as La Forest J. emphasized in L. (T.P.), the relative weight and importance of these multiple factors will frequently vary depending on the nature of the crime and the circumstances of the offender. In the final analysis, the overarching duty of a sentencing judge is to draw upon all the legitimate principles of sentencing to determine a "just and appropriate" sentence which reflects the gravity of the offence committed and the moral blameworthiness of the offender.

C. Did the Court of Appeal err in holding that the Crown was obligated to bring dangerous offender proceedings?

83 As a third ground of appeal, the Crown submits that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred by stating that the Crown had an obligation to bring dangerous offender proceedings under Part XXIV of the Criminal Code against the respondent. The relevant passage of the judgment of Wood J.A. occurs in his discussion of the alleged justifications of the respondent's sentence, at p. 117:

> The other utilitarian goal of sentencing which must be taken into account when sentence is passed is the rehabilitation of the offender. Very little was said about the appellant's rehabilitation by the trial judge, although as the second passage from his reasons indicates he clearly had it in mind. He was apparently of the view that an additional five years of parole supervision would add substantially to the rehabilitative value of the sentence he imposed. With respect, the appellant was 52 years of age when sentenced. If there was any realistic possibility that he would not be fully rehabilitated by the time he finished serving his parole from a twenty-year sentence, the Crown had an obligation to bring dangerous offender proceedings against him. No such proceedings were brought. [Emphasis added.]

In the course of its oral and written submissions, the Crown argued that the foregoing statement of Wood J.A. represented a serious intrusion upon an established domain of prosecutorial discretion in finding that the Crown was required to initiate dangerous offender proceedings in this instance. In support of its argument, the Crown drew attention to this Court's judgment in L. (T.P.), at p. 348, which unambiguously recognized the importance of prosecutorial discretion in the imposition of dangerous offender proceedings under Part XXIV.

84 With respect, I believe that the Crown has profoundly misunderstood the remarks of Wood J.A. in this context. In contrast to the Crown, I would stress the conditional tone of the introductory clause of Wood J.A.'s remark ("If there was any realistic possibility ..."). I do not interpret the foregoing passage as holding that the Crown was required to invoke dangerous offender proceedings in this case. Indeed, it would be quite odd for Wood J.A. to insist that the respondent ought to have been subjected to indefinite detention for dangerousness in the context of a larger judgment in which he concluded that the fixed-term sentence of the respondent was overly harsh and ought to be significantly reduced. Rather, I understand the relevant passage as stating that given that the Crown has chosen not to invoke dangerous offender, there are limits to the ability of the sentencing judge to impose a long fixed-term sentence in light of the existence of the dangerous offenders regime. The meaning of the disputed passage is elucidated by the concurring remarks of Rowles J.A. on the implications of the existence of the dangerous offenders regime for the sentencing discretion of judges. As she stated, at pp. 125-26:

> There is no dispute that one of the applicable sentencing principles which had to be considered by the trial judge in this case was the protection of society. Consideration of that principle generally arises in the case of violent offenders, but its application is not to be used as an expedient alternative to dangerous offender proceedings which may be taken by the Crown under Pt. XXIV of the Criminal Code. ... Part XXIV of the Code provides for some procedural and substantive safeguards which are not part of the usual sentencing process. The wisdom of having such safeguards cannot, I think, be seriously questioned, considering the substantial body of literature on the problems and complexities of predicting dangerousness over the long term. ...
> . . . . .
> As Mr. Justice Wood has pointed out, dangerous offender proceedings were not brought by the Crown in this case, and no determination was made by the trial judge that an isolative sentence beyond 20 years was required for the protection of society. [Emphasis added.]

In short, I interpret the position of the majority of the Court of Appeal to be that since the Crown did not pursue dangerous offender proceedings in this instance, the sentencing judge should not have imposed a lengthy term of imprisonment motivated principally by the dangerousness of the respondent and the protection of society which obviated the substantive and procedural protections of Part XXIV of the Code.

85 As such, I find that this ground of appeal, as originally framed by the Crown, must fail. The comments of Wood J.A., interpreted in light of the parallel comments of Rowles J.A., did not hold that the Crown was obliged to pursue dangerous offender proceedings against the respondent.

86 The comments of the Court of Appeal, however, raise important questions concerning the relationship between a trial judge's traditional sentencing discretion and the statutory regime for dangerous offenders created under Part XXIV of the Criminal Code. More specifically, Wood J.A. and Rowles J.A. identify issues relating to the sentencing responsibility of judges where the Crown has declined to pursue dangerous offender proceedings. In L. (T.P.), supra, I was in substantial agreement with the majority judgment of La Forest J. that there may indeed be circumstances where a life sentence, motivated in large part by the dangerousness of the offender, may be undesirable in light of Parliament's creation of a separate and distinct dangerous offenders regime. Prior to Lyons, a number of appellate court decisions, most notably R. v. Hill (1974), 15 C.C.C. (2d) 145 (Ont. C.A.), affirmed [1977] 1 S.C.R. 827, had suggested that a trial judge should exercise his or her discretion to impose a sentence of life imprisonment (if available) when faced with a patently dangerous offender who enjoys no prospects for rehabilitation. As Jessup J.A. expressed the sentencing principle in Hill, at p. 147:

> When an accused has been convicted of a serious crime in itself calling for a substantial sentence and when he suffers from some mental or personality disorder rendering him a danger to the community but not subjecting him to confinement in a mental institution and when it is uncertain when, if ever, the accused will be cured of his affliction, in my opinion the appropriate sentence is one of life. [Emphasis added.]

Pursuant to this principle, the Court of Appeal increased a sentence of 12 years for an aggravated rape to one of life imprisonment. See, similarly, R. v. Hastings (1985), 58 A.R. 108 (C.A.), at pp. 111-12; R. v. Kempton (1980), 53 C.C.C. (2d) 176 (Alta. C.A.), at pp. 191-92; R. v. Pontello (1977), 38 C.C.C. (2d) 262 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 268-69; R. v. Haig (1974), 26 C.R.N.S. 247 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 247-48. In L. (T.P.), however, this Court cast serious doubt on the continuing validity of the Hill principle. As La Forest J. stated, at pp. 330-31:
